PREFACE.

THE following translation was made several years ago for my own private use, and without any intention of ever publishing it. But Mr. Hall, the editor of the American Law Journal, having expressed a wish to insert it in that valuable periodical work, I freely consented to it, having no other idea at the time but that it should appear there as an anonymous performance. The manuscript was accordingly handed over to the printers of the Journal, and the first ten chapters were printed off, without undergoing any other corrections but such as occurred in revising the proof sheets, to which I subjoined a few short notes as I went along.

But while I was engaged in that occupation, I felt my ancient attachment to a favourite author revive; the subject grew upon me; I gave an attentive revisal to the remainder of the manuscript, and added to it a more copious body of notes; and I now, with diffidence, venture to present the result of my labours in my name to my brethren of the American bar. It is, according to its first destination, published in and for the American Law Journal, and will be delivered to its subscribers as the third number of the third volume of that publication; but a sufficient number of copies will also be struck off for such as may wish to possess it as a separate work.

I need not explain to those who are conversant with the works of my author, that his Quæstiones Juris Publici are divided into two parts, entirely distinct from and unconnected with each other, otherwise than by being published together under one title, and by their general relation to subjects of public law. The first part, De Rebus Bellicis, treats exclusively of the law of war, and forms of itself a complete treatise on that particular subject. I have thought it best, therefore, to translate and publish it separately, under its appropriate title, A Treatise on the Law of War.

To expatiate on the merits of this excellent work would be useless. It is known and admired wherever the law of nations is acknowledged to have a binding force. Its authority is confessed in the cabinets of princes, as well as in the halls of courts of justice: to be unacquainted with it, is a disgrace to the lawyer and to the statesman. It ranks its author among the great masters of the law of nature and nations, with Grotius, Puffendorff, Wolffius, and Vattel. His range is not indeed so extensive as that of his illustrious colleagues; but he has more profoundly investigated and more copiously discussed than any of them the particular branch which he assigned to himself.

It is extraordinary that a treatise, the merit of which is so generally acknowledged, has not as yet been translated into any of the modern languages (the Low Dutch excepted), and that the English, particularly, who profess to admire it so much, have not favoured the world with a good translation of it into our common idiom. For we cannot consider as such the incorrect and incomplete version which in the year 1759 was, by the help of some interpolations, published by Mr. Richard Lee, as an original work, under the title of A Treatise of Captures in War, a second edition whereof appeared at London in 1803, in the preface to which the book is for the first time acknowledged to be an enlarged translation of the present work. The insufficiency of that performance to supply the place of our author's text is every where admitted; and the friends of science in this country have long expected that some of the learned civilians of Great Britain, a Robinson, a Ward, or a Brown, would present the world with an English translation of the treatise De Rebus Bellicis, executed in a manner worthy of its author. But this fond hope has unfortunately been disappointed.

No person has wished more anxiously than myself to see this translation performed by some one of the able professors whom I have just named, and who are so capable of doing it complete justice. Then my favourite author would have appeared in an English dress, with all the advantages which brilliant talents, combined with a profound knowledge of the science of which he treats, could have given him. The translation which I offer to the public cannot boast such high advantages; it claims no other merit but that of correctness, the only one which a translator cannot dispense with. To deserve this humble praise has been the object of my constant efforts. I have endeavoured to discover the precise English expressions which my author would have used, if he had written in our language. If sometimes I have shortened his long Ciceronian periods, and divided them into more convenient paragraphs; if sometimes, also, I have connected his phrases in a manner more suited, as I thought, to the idiom in which I wrote, I believe that I have done it without injury to the sense. Where my author narrates, I have endeavoured to state with fidelity the facts and events that he relates; where he argues, to convey the full force of his able and luminous reasoning, and I was sensible that it could not be done better, than by keeping as close to the text as possible. I have but in few instances wandered from this strict plan, and only where our author treats of local subjects, of little or no interest to the American reader. Of the few other liberties, which I have thought necessary to take in the course of this work, it is proper that I should give an account in this place.

I have shortened the titles of the several chapters, which in the original are presented in the shape of queries, to suit the modest title of Questions, which is prefixed to the whole work. Considering this first part, as justly entitled to be considered a complete and regular treatise on the law of war, I have thought it my duty to present it as such to my readers, and to head its several divisions accordingly.

For the same reason, I have entitled the twenty fifth chapter, which in the original bears the title of “ Various Small Questions,” (Variæ Quæstiuncule); MISCELLANEOUS MAXIMS AND OBSERVATIONS, for such they will appear to be; and I have headed each of the sections into which that chapter is divided, with the result of the observations that it contains, in the form of an axiom or aphorism, so that the reader may see at once the proposition which the author means to maintain or to illustrate in each of those subdivisions.

I have omitted the whole of the twenty third chapter and some parts of a few others, which are pointed out in notes in their several places, as treating of subjects which are local in their nature and application, and consequently, are neither useful nor interesting to us. I have, for the same reason, left out a great number of the references, which our author frequently makes to the Dutch statute books, and to some other national works, little or not at all known in this country. I have, however, preserved a few to some of the most noted among them, and particularly to Aitzema, whose Chronicle I consider as an excellent compilation of historical facts and documents, of which I have endeavoured to give a character in a note to page 15.

I have thrown into notes, in the fifteen last chapters, the numerous references which abound in the body of the original work. The first ten chapters being in the press, as I have already mentioned, when I began to revise this translation, I was prevented from doing the same with respect to them by the fear of giving to the printers too much additional trouble.

With regard to the notes which I have subjoined to the body of the work, and which, to distinguish them from those of the author, are marked T., they are principally intended to elucidate and explain the text. Our author often slightly refers to facts which were well known, and some of them even remembered in his day; frequently, also, he alludes to particular texts of the civil law, and to the opinions of writers whose works were familiar to the civilians of Europe and of his country, but are little read among us. In every such instance, whenever it has been in my power, I have presented the reader, in a note, with the text or passage referred to; and where that could not conveniently be done, I have given such explanations as I thought would best enable him clearly to understand the scope and meaning of the observations or arguments of our author.

As I progressed in the work, I have added some other notes, which exhibit a comparative view of the principles and practice of the different states of America and Europe on various interesting points. In a few instances I have presumed to advance my own opinions, and even in some of them to differ from my author himself; but I have done it, I am sure, in the spirit, and, I hope, in the manner pointed out by the great orator, quærens omnia, dubitans plerumque, et mihi diffidens.*

I have thought that an account of the life and writings of Bynkershoek would not be unacceptable to the reader, and therefore it will be found immediately after this preface. I have added to it a brief alphabetical notice of those writers on the civil law or the law of nations, whose works are not generally known, and are quoted or referred to in this book. A list of the American and English cases cited in the notes, and a table of reference to the books and titles of the quotations from the text of the civil law, which occur in the course of the original work, are also subjoined. I regret that some errors of inadvertence have escaped my attention, particularly in the notes, which I acknowledge, were written with some degree of haste, though they are the result of much previous study and reflection. Such of those errors as I have discovered are noticed in an errata, at the end of the book.†

Being about to commit this work to the candour and indulgence of the public, I have thought it necessary to premise these few observations. It has long been, as I have already observed, an anxious wish of the American jurists to see this celebrated treatise correctly translated into our language, and published in a portable form. It is very difficult to procure in this country a copy of the original, which is only to be found in a few of our libraries. Nor can it be obtained from Europe, without purchasing at the same time two folio volumes, which contain a great deal of matter of little interest to those who do not make the civil law the object of their particular study. With the greatest diffidence, therefore, I submit this feeble attempt to the candid and enlightened judgment of my professional brethren; if it shall be thought deserving of their approbation, I shall consider it as an ample and honourable reward of my labours, otherwise I shall endeavour to profit by their censure.

At the present moment, when the fate of Holland creates a lively interest in every feeling mind, the public will be disposed to receive with peculiar indulgence, a work which recalls to our memory the brilliant epochs of that celebrated republic, once so famed in arts as well as in arms. She has proved to the world, that the republican spirit of commerce, and the honourable pursuits of industrious enterprise are not incompatible with any of those more brilliant attainments by which nations as well as individuals are raised to celebrity. Since her separation from the Spanish empire she has produced more great men, and achieved more great deeds, than all the remainder of that once immense and powerful monarchy.

Holland is no more, but the remembrance of her past glory can never die. The admirers of military exploits will with pleasure and pride dwell on the achievements of her Maurice, her De Ruyters, and her Van Tromps. The statesman will still guide his political bark by the lights which her De Witts, her Van Beuningens, and her Fagels have supplied. The astronomer, the philosopher, will explore the secrets of nature and the heavens, with her 'sGravesandes and her Huygens. The physician will improve his theory and his practice by the discoveries of her Boerhaaves and her Van Swietens. And the student, who delights in investigating the principles of that law of nations, so much talked of and so little practised, will ever revere the hallowed soil which gave birth to such illustrious men as Grotius and our BYNKERSHOEK.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE
LIFE AND WRITINGS
THE AUTHOR.

CORNELIUS VAN BYNKERSHOEK was born the 29th of May 1673, at Middleburgh, the capital of the province of Zealand, where his father was a respectable merchant. He received his education at the university of Franeker in Friesland, and his juvenile exercises while there, drew upon him the attention of the celebrated professor Huberus,* who in one of his elaborate dissertations, calls him eruditissimus juvenis CORNELIUS BYNKERSHOEK.† On leaving the university, he settled at the Hague, where he exercised with great applause the profession of an advocate, and published from time to time ingenious and learned dissertations on various subjects of the civil, and of his own municipal law. In the year 1702, he published his excellent dissertation De Dominio Maris, and the next year was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Holland, Zealand, and West Friesland, which sat at the Hague. In the year 1721, he published his learned treatise De foro Legatorum, and three years afterwards, on the 26th of May 1724, was appointed president of the respectable court, of which he already was a member. He was now fifty one years of age. His celebrated Quæstiones juris publici, are among the last works that he produced, as they did not appear until the year 1737, when he was sixty four years old. He died of a dropsy in the chest, on the 16th of April 1743, in the seventieth year of his age. He was twice married. By his second wife he had no children, but left six daughters by his first wife.

His works consist chiefly of dissertations and treatises (which he modestly calls questions) on various subjects of the law of nations, and of the civil law, combined in some instances with the municipal regulations of his own country. They were published separately, in his lifetime, except the Quæstiones juris privati, which appeared only after his death. These are only a part of a larger work, which he did not live to finish. He had however prepared the four first books for the press, when death put a period to his labours. He had not even time to write more than the first paragraph of a preface, with which he intended to usher that work into the world, and in which he appears fully sensible of his approaching end.

Eighteen years after his death, his scattered writings were collected together by the learned Vicat,* professor of jurisprudence in the college of Lausanne in Switzerland, and published in two folio volumes at Geneva, in the year 1761. This edition is the only one, that we know of, of all the works of our author, though we are informed that some of his treatises have gone through several editions in his own country. The Baron Von Ompteda notices a second edition of the Quæstiones juris publici, Leyden 1752, 4to. But this, the best and most complete monument of his fame, was published in a foreign land.

This edition is remarkable for its beauty and correctness, and is adorned with an elegant preface by the learned editor, and an account of the author's life and writings, from which we have in part gathered the information which we now communicate to the American reader.

* M. Vicat is the author of an esteemed treatise on natural law, entitled: Traité du Droit Naturel & de l'application de ses principes au Droit Civil & au Droit des Gens. Lausanne, 1782, 4 vols. 8vo. Baron Von Ompteda calls it a very useful book. Littér. des Völkerr. p. 389.

† Littératur des Völkerr. p. 420.

We shall here give a brief notice of the several works of our author, which are contained in the collection of professor Vicat, although but few of them can be of any practical use in this country, yet we believe that a general idea of the whole will not be thought altogether uninteresting.

I. The first volume contains:

1. Observationes juris Romani, in eight books, in which a variety of curious points, relating to the ancient Roman jurisprudence, are ably discussed, several of which are interesting in an historical point of view, as elucidating through the medium of their laws, the manners and customs of that once great people. Among those, we notice the first chapter of the first book, in which the terrible partis secanto of the law of the twelve tables is ingeniously and plausibly maintained to have meant no more than that the insolvent debtor should be sold in the public market as a slave, and the proceeds of the sale distributed among his creditors. The 14th chapter of the third book discusses the question, how far and in what cases the military force could among the Romans be called in to the aid of the judicial authority. In the 4th book, chap. 13, the author comments on the 19th law of the digest De ritu nuptiarum, by which a father was obliged to give his daughter in marriage with a competent portion, if a suitable match offered; and if he refused, might be compelled to it by the magistrate. Various other subjects of an equally interesting nature to the scientific lawyer, are examined and discussed in the course of that work; of which we think it sufficient to have instanced a few, to give an idea of the general scope and object of the whole.

2. Opuscula varii argumenti. This work like the former, consists of dissertations on various subjects of the Roman law. They are six in number, the most interesting of which are the first, on the second law of the digest De origine juris, the third on the right which fathers had among the ancient Romans, of killing, selling, or exposing their children, and the fourth on the Roman laws, respecting foreign modes of worship. This last is replete with curious information, particularly with regard to the law which prevailed on that important subject, in the first ages of christianity.

3. This volume concludes with an answer to his learned cotemporary Gerard Noodt, who had controverted some of the opinions which he had delivered in his above mentioned dissertation, on the power which fathers had at Rome over their children.

II. The contents of the second volume are as follow:

1. Opera Minora, consisting of six dissertations on various subjects, none of which will be thought very interesting in this country, except the 5th, De Dominio Maris, and the 6th, De foro legatorum. These, indeed, had he never written any thing else, would have been sufficient to establish our author's reputation as a lawyer, and a publicist. Every one who has read and understood, and of course admired them, cannot help finding fault with the excessive modesty which induced him to publish them under the inappropriate title of opera minora. The learned world has long classed them among the best works that have ever appeared on those generally interesting subjects.

In the dissertation De Dominio Maris, our author considers the long agitated question of the Dominion of the Sea, in a liberal and impartial manner, unbiassed by prejudice, and unswayed by party spirit. He calmly and dispassionately considers in what cases the sea is capable of becoming the subject of sovereignty or exclusive jurisdiction, discusses with candor the various pretensions which different states have set up from time to time to the dominion of that element, or of considerable portions thereof; and upon the whole, his conclusions are such as reason avows, and moderate men will ever be disposed to adopt.

His dissertation, or rather treatise De foro Legatorum is in every body's hands, in the excellent translation which Mr. Barbeyrac made of it into the French language, with notes, in which he has displayed his usual judgment and learning. That translation has not only received the approbation, but the praise of our author himself, with whom Mr. Barbeyrac was intimate. We shall therefore dispense with giving a more particular account of a work which is so well and so generally known. To name it is sufficient praise.

2. Quæstiones juris publici. This work is divided into two parts; the first of which, entitled De Rebus Bellicis is now presented in an English translation to the American public, under its appropriate title of “A Treatise on the Law of War;” and a more complete one never yet has been written on this interesting subject. The second part which is entitled De rebus varii argumenti, treats of various subjects, some of them belonging to the law of nations, and others to the constitution and laws of the United Netherlands. From the 3d to the 12th chapter inclusive, our author treats of the law of ambassadors, and those chapters might well be added to the treatise De foro Legatorum, with the subject of which they are more nearly connected than with any other. In the seventh chapter he examines the question, whether the acts of a minister are binding when contrary to his secret instructions. The 21st chapter treats of the salute to ships of war at sea, and seems to belong more properly to the dissertation De Dominio Maris, where the same subject is treated of. The remainder of the chapters, twenty-five in number, do not treat of any subject of general concern, and the whole of this second book is unconnected with the first, which is best exhibited as a separate and independent treatise on the Law of War.

The Quæstiones juris publici have been translated into the Low Dutch language by Matthias Ruuscher, in the year 1739. We do not know of any other translation of them into any language whatever, except that of the first book by Mr. Lee into English, of which we have made mention in the preface.

3. Quæstiones juris privati. This work, which was to have contained one hundred chapters, and contains only forty-eight, was left incomplete, as we have already mentioned, by the death of the learned author. It is divided into four books, chiefly on topics of the civil law and the municipal law of Holland. The fourth book alone, and the last chapter of the third, may be considered as interesting to the American jurist, as they treat of the subject of insurance, and of various points of the maritime and commercial law. This work closes the second and last volume.

Our author also wrote two other considerable works, the one entitled Corpus juris Hollandiæ & Zelandiæ, and the other Observationes Tumultuariæ or hasty notes, being memoranda which he took from day to day, of the decisions of the court in which he sat for the space of forty years. He gave directions by his will, to his executors, that those works should not be published; and they strictly complied with his injunction. As the ancient laws of Holland have been subverted, and the Napoleon code introduced in their place, it is probable that those writings, if published, would not be found of any great use at the present time.

The character of our author's works has long been established among the learned of Europe. Heineccius, who, in the year 1723, published at Leipsick, an edition of the four first books of the Observationes Juris Romani, calls him in his preface to that work, "a man of consummate learning and ability, possessing a sound discriminating mind, and an extraordinary and incredible fund of legal knowledge."* Barbeyrac, in the preface to his translation of the treatise De foro Legatorum, describes him as one of that superior class of writers, whose works are only intended for men of learning, and who, disdain- ing to retail the opinions of others, are unwilling to say any thing which has been observed before, and endeavour, as much as they can, to exhibit their subject in some new point of view. "And he is right;" continues he, "to have taken that ground. One who possesses, within himself, such a rich fund of know- ledge, may well leave it to others to borrow and repeat what has already been said."†

In England, the great Lord Mansfield thought him worthy of his high commendation from the bench, and recommended the work which we have translated, to the attention of the mem- bers of the English bar.* Since that time, our author's works on the law of nations, (but particularly that which is now be- fore us) have been considered as standard authorities, in Great Britain as well as in the United States, and are daily quoted with respect by the bar, and relied on by the bench as the ground of their decisions.

* Admiratus præcipuè viri eruditissimi judicium acre, ingenium solers, juris scientiam inusitatam ac denique incredibilem.

† Notre auteur est un de ces écrivains du plus haut vol, qui n'écrivent que pour les sçavants, et qui ne veulent dire, autant qu'il se peut, rien que du nouveau. Et il a raison de se mettre sur ce pied là. Quand on est si riche de son propre fonds, on fait très bien de laisser à d'autres le soin d'emprunter ce qui a été déjà dit.

* Lord Mansfield spoke extremely well of Bynkershoek, and recommended especially, as well worth reading, his book of prizes, Questiones juris publici. 2 Bur. 690. in margin.

Nor have our American statesmen been behindhand in commending the merit and talents of this eminent writer. Among them none has bestowed upon him more correct and judicious praise, than the great character, who is generally understood to be the author of the excellent Examination of the British doctrine, which subjects to capture a neutral trade, not open in time of peace. “Bynkershoek,” says he, “treats the subject of belligerent and neutral relations with more attention, and explains his ideas with more precision than any of his predecessors.”† How honourable to our author is this testimony, when we consider, on the one hand, by whom it is given; and reflect on the other, that in the list of those predecessors whom Mr. Madison speaks of, are found the celebrated names of Puffendorff and of Grotius!

It ought to be a great inducement to the study of the law of nations, that the fame of those who devote themselves to that important branch of science, extends throughout the civilized world; while the most excellent works on mere municipal jurisprudence, are hardly known or spoken of out of the country which gave them birth. Thus the writings of Grotius, Bynkershoek, and Vattel, are read and admired in all America and Europe, while the very names of Coke and Dumoulin‡ are unknown out of the countries where the particular systems of law are in force, which they took so much pains to methodize and elucidate. Of the truth of this observation, a striking instance is to be found in the works of our author, who from an opinion of lord Coke, which he had found quoted and misrepresented in Dr. Zouch's treatise De jure inter gentes, conceiving him to be a writer entirely ignorant of the law of nations, treated him and his opinion with the most marked contempt, calling him a certain Coke, (Cocus quidam); and punning upon his name, declared that he could not concoct his opinions, nor could they be concocted by the other writers on the law of nations.*

It is to be wished that this passage were expunged from our author's writings, particularly as it is, perhaps, the only time that he has indulged in such undignified language; and unfortunately he has applied it to a man whom of all others he would have admired, had his studies but led him to a perusal of his writings. Little did he know that that Cocus quidam, whom he so unjustly despised, was one whose powerful mind was in every respect congenial to his own; and yet he thought him unworthy of his serious notice, while he paid an unmerited attention to the works and opinions of such an inferior writer as Dr. Zouch. But Zouch had written on the law of nations, which is studied every where, and the great Coke had only elucidated the municipal law of England, which is not any where an object of attention, except in those countries where it is the established system of jurisprudence.

Unfortunately many of the works that have appeared on various subjects of the law of nations, are some of them polemical writings, written in the heat of a particular controversy, and on the spur of the occasion; and others, though professing to be on a more liberal scale, do nevertheless betray the partiality of their authors to the system adopted by the country in which they lived, or the governments under whose patronage they wrote: it is not so with the work which we now present to

* — eamque sententiam tuetur COCUS QUIDAM apud Zoucheum, De jur. fec. p. 2. § 4. Q. 19. Sed ego tam difficilis stomachi sum, ut eam sententiam concoquere non possim, neque etiam concoxit Albericus Gentilis neque Zoucheus. Quæst. jur. pub. l. 2. c. 5. The opinion that our author could not assent to is that which is expressed by Lord Coke in 4th Inst. 153. "If a banished man be sent as ambassador to the place from whence he is banished, he may not be detained or offended there; and this also agreeth with the civil law." But he had not well considered that opinion, which appears a very sound one, and perfectly agrees with his own, which is, that such a minister indeed, may be sent out of the country; but that it would be a violation of good faith, to detain and punish him for having returned, notwithstanding his sentence of banishment. But Bynkershoek viewed Lord Coke in the light in which he was exhibited to him by Zouch, who represented that great man as learned, indeed, in the municipal law of England, but ignorant of the law of nations Juris patrii consultissimus noster Eduardus Cocus; ejus quod cum exteris obtine- NON ADEO PERITUS. Zouch, ubi supra.

the public; it was written at a time when Europe was in a state of profound peace, when there was no particular point warmly controverted between the European governments, and although the author was a Dutchman, and wrote in the bosom of his native country, yet we see that he did not even adopt the favorite doctrine, for which his government had been struggling during the space of near a century, that free ships make free goods; so that although many among us may not agree with him on this particular point, still we cannot withhold from him the praise of a strict and honest impartiality; and upon the whole, very few propositions will be found in the present treatise, to which all moderate and impartial men will not give their cordial and unfeigned assent.

ALPHABETICAL NOTICE
OF
ON THE

CIVIL LAW AND THE LAW OF NATIONS:

Not generally known, and which are quoted or referred to in this book.

ABREU (the chevalier de). See note, p. 130.

AITZEMA (Leo or Leeuwe). See note, p. 15.

BELLUS (Petrinus), a Venetian writer, author of a dissertation De re militari, printed at Venice in 1563, 4to. It is to be found also in the 16th vol. of Tractatus Tractatum, seu Oceanus Juris; an enormous work, being a collection of legal tracts, in 18 folio volumes, published at Venice in 1584, under the auspices of pope Gregory the 13th. It contains a multitude of writings on the civil and canon law, by jurists of the middle ages; some of them of so early a period as the sixth century. In this curious collection, there are several tracts which relate to subjects of the law of nations.

BOLAÑOS (Juan de Hevia), a Spanish writer, a native of Oviedo, in the province of Asturias; author of an excellent institute of the law of Spain, entitled Curia Philippica; the last part of which treats of commercial and maritime law, and has been the foundation of many subsequent works upon that subject. Roccus has borrowed liberally from it. This work is remarkable for its clearness, brevity and precision, and lays down very sound and correct principles on the subject of maritime and commercial jurisprudence. The author informs us, that it was finished at the city of Los Reyes, in the kingdom of Peru, on Christmas eve, in the year 1615. It may therefore be considered as an American production. The edition before us, was printed at Madrid, 1783, in folio. It is a book of very great authority throughout the Spanish dominions, and in our territories of Orleans and Louisiana, and is often quoted by foreign writers, on subjects relating to maritime law.

BUDDÆUS (John Francis), a German professor at Halle, and afterwards at Jena, where he died in 1705. He was the author of several works, and among others, of a book entitled Elementa Philosophiæ practicæ, instrumentalis & theoreticæ, 3 vols. 8vo. the same which is so contemptuously referred to by our author, and was nevertheless formerly so celebrated, that the professors of the protestant universities of Germany, took it for the text of their lectures. He also wrote the great German historical dictionary, printed several times at Basil and Leipsig, in 2 vols. fol.

CLEIRAC, a Frenchman, author of a valuable work on maritime law, entitled Les Us & Coutumes de la Mer. It contains, 1. The text of the laws of Oleron, Wisbuy, and the Hanse Towns, with learned notes. 2. Le Guidon de la Mer, an ancient French treatise on maritime contracts, and principally on Insurance, divided into sections, in the form of an institute, and enriched with notes fraught with much curious learning. 3. The laws or ordinances of Antwerp and Amsterdam, concerning insurance. 4. A treatise on the French admiralty jurisdiction, and a copious index to the whole work. There have been several editions of this book; the first that we find any mention of, was printed in 1647; and the last at Amsterdam, in 1788.

CODE DES PRISES. This French work is well known in this country, but it is not generally understood that there are four editions of it, or rather four different works, all nearly on the same plan, but published at different periods; and containing more or less information on the important subject of maritime captures.

The first is the Old Code des Prises, by M. Chardon, who was secretary, under the monarchy, to the council of prizes at Paris. It is entitled Code des Prises; ou recueil des Edits, Declarations, &c. depuis 1400, jusqu' à présent; Imprimé par ordre du Roi; 2 vols. 4to. Paris, imprimerie royale, 1784.

The second is entitled Code des Prises maritimes & armemens en course, par le Citoyen G., homme de loi; 2 vols. 12mo. Paris, Garnery, an 7.

The title of the third is Nouveau Code des Prises, par le Cit. Le Beau, 4 vols. 8vo. Paris, Imprimerie de la Republique, ans 7, 8 & 9. It is brought down to the 3d Prairial, 8th year, (23d of May, 1800.)

small close print. Paris, Duprat du Verger, 1804. It is more copious and complete, and is brought down to a later period, than any of the others.

CONSILIA BELGICA is a collection of official opinions given to the states general of the United Netherlands, by the law officers of that government.

CONSILIA HOLLANDICA, are the opinions of the law officers of the provincial states of Holland and West Friesland, collected in like manner.

CONSOLATO DEL MARE. This celebrated work is but little known in this country, owing to the difficulty of procuring it from abroad, and to its being written in languages not generally understood. The forty three first chapters have been translated from the Amsterdam edition, by Westerveen, and published in the American Law Journal, (vol. ii. p. 385, and vol. iii. p. 1.) but they relate only to the form of judicial proceedings in the maritime courts of the kingdom of Majorca, and are thought by many not to belong to the ancient Consolato.

The oldest edition of this work has lately been discovered by Mr. Boucher, in the Imperial library at Paris. It is embodied with the marine ordinance of Barcelona, of which it constitutes the principal part, and was printed in that city, in the Catalonian language, in the year 1494, thirty-seven years only after the discovery of the art of printing. Mr. Boucher has favoured the public with a translation of it into the French language, printed at Paris in 1808, several copies of which have already made their way into this country. Mr. Hall, of Baltimore, (to whom the profession is already indebted for a very good translation of the Praxis Curie Admiraltatis, enriched with learned and useful notes,) is, we understand, at present employed in translating it into the English language, which will entitle him to the thanks, not only of the scientific, but also of the practical lawyer. That excellent book has been styled, with great propriety, the Pandects of maritime law.

A copy of the beautiful edition of the Consolato, published at Madrid, in 1791, in the Catalonian language, with a Spanish translation, by Don Antonio de Capmany y de Monfalau, is in the library of the American Philosophical Society, to whom it was presented by his excellency, the marquis de Casa Yrujo.

CUNÆUS or à Cunæo (Gulielmus) author of a small treatise on Suretiship (De materia securitatis). See MERCATURA (De).

CURIA PHILIPICA, See BOLAÑOS.

CYNUS or Cino, was a learned Italian lawyer, who flourished in the beginning of the 14th century. He died at Bologna, in 1336. He wrote a commentary on the Code, and some parts of the Digests.

GALIANI (the abbé Ferdinando), is a celebrated Neapolitan writer. He was secretary to the Neapolitan legation at Paris, and afterwards a member of the Royal Council of Commerce in his own country. In the year 1782, he published at Naples, his treatise De' doveri de' Principi neutrali verso i Principi guerreggianti, e di questi verso i neutrali; (Of the duties of neutral and belligerent princes towards each other.) It was translated into German by professor Kænig, and published at Leipsick, in two octavo volumes, in 1790, under the title of Recht der Neutralität (the law of Neutrality.) The life of Galiani has been written and published at Naples, by Diodati, in 1788. See LAMPREDI.

GAMA (Antonio de), born at Lisbon in 1520; was counsellor of state, and high chancellor to the king of Portugal. He wrote, among other things, a book of reports of Portuguese decisions, entitled, Decisiones Supremi Lusitaniae Senatus, in folio. He died in 1595, at the age of 75 years, greatly respected for his immense erudition.

GENTILIS (Albericus;) born in the marquisate of Ancona, in the Roman state, about the year 1550; was professor of the civil law at Oxford, and died at London in 1608. He published a treatise, De jure belli, in three books, which has not been useless to Grotius, and in which, at that early day, he supported the belligerent claims of Great Britain, against the pretensions of neutrals. Lampredi, in his preface, says, that he was the first who endeavoured to introduce a system of jurisprudence amidst the din of arms. Although he may be properly considered as an English writer, it is remarkable that his name does not appear in the Bibliotheca Legum Angliæ.

GRONOVIVS (John Frederick), was born at Hamburgh, in 1611, and was professor of literature at Dorchester. and afterwards at Leyden, where he died in 1672. He published many valuable editions of Latin authors, and among others of Grotius, De jure belli ac pacis, with learned annotations. His son, James Gronovius, distinguished himself likewise, by several works of learning and erudition.

GUIDON DE LA MER (Le). See CLEIRAC.

HORNE (Thomas Hartwell), an Englishman; is the author of an useful work, entitled: A compendium of the statute laws and regulations of the court of admiralty, relative to ships of war, privateers, prizes, recaptures and prize money; with an appendix of notes, pre- cedents, &c. 168 pages, duodecimo; London, Clarke, 1803. This book is scarce in America.

IMOLA (Joannes de), was professor of the civil law, at Bologna, in the Papal states, and a disciple of the elder Baldus. He composed a great number of professional works, which were much admired in his day, but are at present no longer read. He died in 1436.

KOCH, a Frenchman, professor of law at the university of Strasburgh, and member of the national institute, is the author of an excellent work in the French language, entitled, Abregé de l'Histoire des Traités de paix entre les puissances de l'Europe, depuis la paix de Westphalie, Basil 1796. 4 vols. 8vo.

LAMPREDI, was a professor of the law of nations, at the university of Pisa in Tuscany. He published at Florence, in the year 1788, his Trattato del commercio de' popoli neutrali in tempo di guerra, (a treatise on the commerce of neutral nations in time of war.) It has been translated into German, by professor König, Leipsig, 1790; and into French, by M. Peuchet, Paris, 1802, one vol. octavo. M. Peuchet tells us, that the ministry of Louis XVI. had ordered a translation of this work to be made, but it was not executed during his reign.

Lampredi combats on many points, the doctrines of Galiani, whose book is written in favour of the freedom of the neutral flag, while his opponent supports the opposite doctrine, so strenuously contended for by Great Britain. These two works were written at the close of the American war; the one at Naples, which was at that time under French, and the other in Tuscany, which was under British influence. See GALIANI.

LOCCENIUS (Johannes), author of a valuable treatise in three books, entitled, De jure maritimo & navali. It has been published by Heineccius, together with Styffman's Jus maritimum & nauticum, and Kuricke's Diatribe de Assecurationibus, under the title of Scriptorum de jure nautico & maritimo Fasciculus, in two vols. 4to. Hal. Magdeb. 1740.

MARQUARDUS (Johannes), a German, is the author of a very learned treatise on mercantile law, in the Latin language, entitled, Tractatus politico-juridicus de jure mercatorum & commerciorum singulari, in 4 books, printed at Frankfort, in 1662, folio, 1316 pages. It contains a number of public documents, historical facts, and other valuable information.

MENOCHIUS (James), a lawyer of Pavia, in Italy, was so learned, that he was called the Baldus and Bartholus of his age; no contempible names among the civilians. He was president of the superior court of Milan, and died in 1607, at the age of 75. Among a variety of professional works which he published, and were much read in his time, he wrote a treatise in folio, De arbitrariis Judicium questionibus & causis conciliorum, which is the work to which our author refers in his 25th chapter, page 196.

MERCATURA (De), a large and valuable collection of treatises and dissertations, by various authors of different nations, on subjects of maritime and commercial law. It is entitled, De Mercaturá, Decisiones & Tractatus varii & de rebus ad eam pertinentibus, 1 vol. fol. Colon. 1622. It contains, amongst other things, the treatises of Straccha and Santerna, and the little tract of Cunæus, mentioned in this book; (See STRACCHA, SANTERNA, CUNÆUS.) It contains also, a collection of the decisions of the court of Rota of Genoa, on subjects of mercantile law, to the number of 215, much in the manner of our common law reports: See Ingersoll's Roccus, p. 53. in not. The remainder consists of a number of other tracts on similar subjects, by various authors, which, as they are not mentioned in this book, we think it unnecessary to notice here.

MORNAC (Anthony), a French advocate, who died in the year 1619. He wrote a great number of professional works, which were published at Paris, in 1724, in four vols. folio. He was a man of great erudition.

NOODT (Gerardus), of Nimeguen, was a Dutch professor, whose writings on the Roman law, are in very great repute among the civilians. His works have been edited by Barbeyrac, the celebrated commentator of Puffendorff and Grotius, and printed at Leyden, in two folio volumes, under the title of Gerardi Noodt, Noviomagi, Jurisconsulti & Antecessoris, opera omnia. Lugd. Bat, 1760.

OMPTEDA (Henry Lewis, Baron von), was ambassador of the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover and duke of Brunswick-Lunenbourg, to the Diet of Ratisbon, and his minister plenipotentiary to the electoral court of Munich. He is the author of an excellent work in the German language, entitled, Litteratur des gesammten sowohl natürlichen als positiven Völkerrechts, or Literature of the natural and positive law of nations; Munich, 1785, 2 vols. 8vo. It is a biographical, critical and bibliographical notice of the various authors who have written on the law of nations, and of their works, down to the time of its publication, arranged in a very methodical order.

Roccus (Franciscus), a Neapolitan, author of the celebrated

NOTABILIA de navibus et naulo; itē de assecurationibus. An excellent English translation of this well known work, the original of which is very scarce, has been lately published, with valuable notes, by Joseph Reed Ingersoll, esq. counsellor at law of this city; one vol. 156 pages, octavo; Philadelphia, Hopkins and Earle, 1809. This translation is executed with great judgment and accuracy, and may, in our opinion, well supply the place of the original.

SANTERNA, (Peter) a Portuguese writer, author of a treatise upon Insurance, entitled, Tractatus de assecurationibus & sponsionibus Mercatorum. See MERCATURA (De).

STRACCHA (Benvenuto), an Italian writer, author of a valuable treatise on the law of merchants, entitled, De Mercaturâ, seu Mercatore. See MERCATURA (De).

US ET COUTUMES DE LA MER. See CLEIRAC.

VALIN (René Josué), was born at Rochelle, in France, where he exercised the profession of an advocate, and was king's attorney, in the court of admiralty, and in the municipal court. He was also a member of the academy of that city, where he died in 1765. His celebrated commentary on Louis XIV.'s Ordonnance de la marine, published at Rochelle, in 1760, in two vols. 4to. is well known in the United States; but few are acquainted in this country with his Treatise on Captures, published at the same place, in 1763, in one vol. 8vo. This excellent work, worthy of the high reputation of its author, is unfortunately out of print; the copy which we have in our possession, was the last which remained two years ago in the bookseller's store, at Rochelle. It is to be hoped that a new edition of it will soon be published.

VERWER (Adriaan), author of a work in the Low Dutch language, entitled, Nederlants See Rechten, Averyen en Bodemeryen or The maritime law of the Netherlands, and the law of average and bottomry. It contains, 1. The laws of Wisbuy, and the ordinance of Amsterdam, with notes. 2. Several ordinances of the Spanish kings, sovereigns of the Netherlands. 3. A treatise on the law of bottomry. 4. A treatise on average, by Quintijn Weijtsen, with an index to the whole. The edition before us was printed at Amsterdam, in 1764.

ZENTGRAVIUS (John Joachim), was professor of divinity at Strasbourg, and wrote in 1684, a dissertation, entitled, De origine, veritate & obligatione juris gentium, in which he maintained against Puffendorff, the existence of a positive law of nations; a controversy which called forth the abilities of several writers at that time, but at this day appears little more than a dispute about words. Zentgravius also wrote a dissertation on Commerce between neutrals and belligerents. Strasb. 1690.

ZOUCH (Richard), an Englishman, born in 1590, in Wiltshire, was professor of civil law in the university of Oxford, and was made judge of the high court of admiralty, by Charles II. at the restoration, in 1660. He wrote some elementary tracts on the civil law, and distinguished himself in the celebrated controversy which took place in that reign, on the subject of admiralty jurisdiction, and was principally managed on the part of the civilians, by himself, Dr. Exton, and Dr. Godolphin. He wrote a treatise on the law of nations, entitled, Juris & Judicii Fecialis sive juris inter gentes & questionum de eodem explicatio, in which he does little more than retail the opinions, and often copies the very words of Grotius. Although this work is frequently quoted by our author, he appears to have been sufficiently sensible of its want of real merit. It was published at London, in 1650, in 4to.; and at the Hague, in 1659, in 16mo.

REFERENCE,

TO enable the reader to find in their numerical order, and by the books to which they respectively belong, the several titles of the Institutes, Digests, and Code, quoted in this work.

INSTITUTES.

De rerum divisione & adquirendo ipsarum dominio. Lib. 2. tit. 1.

DIGESTS.

institoria actione, lib. 14. tit. 3.

jure Fisci, lib. 49. tit. 14.

noxalibus actionibus, lib. 9. tit. 4.

Si quadrupes pauperiem fecisse dicatur, lib. 9. tit. 1.

CODE.

De legibus, & constitutionibus principum, lib. 1. tit. 14.

Ne uxor pro marito, &c. conveniatur, lib. 4. tit. 12.

 The four works which compose the body of the civil law, to wit: the Institutes, Digests, Code and Novels, are divided into Books, Titles, Laws and Sections or paragraphs, and are generally quoted by the English civilians, by referring to those divisions, as for instance, Dig. l. 1. tit. 4. l. 5. § 7., and sometimes Dig., D., or ff. 1. 4. 5. 7., for Digest, Book 1., Title 4., Law 5., Section, or Paragraph 7. The civilians on the continent of Europe, on the contrary, quote the heading of each title, and then refer only to the numerical subdivisions of law and paragraph; sometimes even, they quote the first words of the law, and refer to the paragraph only by its number. Thus our author, page 41, refers generally to the law non omnium, which is the twentieth law of the third title of the first book of the Digests. The references in this work being all by the heading of the title, and not referring to its number, or to that of the book in which it is contained, the foregoing table is presented to our readers, that they may with greater ease turn to the several titles of the books of the Roman law, which are quoted, or referred to in the course of this work.

ON THE LAW OF WAR.

CHAPTER I.

Of War in general.

WHEN Cicero said, l. 1. de Offi. c. 11., that there are two kinds of contests between men, the one by argument, and the other by force, by the latter of these he undoubtedly meant war; though he did not intend, as Grotius would have it,* to give thereby a definition of that state of things. Such a definition would be imperfect, as is clearly that of Albericus Gentilis, who defines war, l. 1. de Jure Bell. c. 2., a just contention of the public force. Both these definitions, although the first and the least perfect is approved of by Grotius, are defective; and the reader will be convinced of it by attending to the following which I have myself attempted, and which, if I mistake not contains all the ingredients which constitute a state of war. WAR, then, is a contest carried on between independent persons, by force, or fraud, for the sake of asserting their rights. Let us now proceed to examine it in detail.

I have said that war is a contest. By this word I have not meant to express merely the act of fighting, but that state of things which is called war; for if the thing itself be defined with sufficient accuracy, its incidents will necessarily follow. Thus jurists have defined slavery, not merely the act by which freemen are subjected to the dominion of others, but the very state and condition of servitude. Grotius himself has attended to this distinction in his definition of war, which he borrowed from Cicero.

* De Jure B. ac P. l. 1. c. 1. § 2. n. 1.

War is also a contest between independent persons. This applies not only to nations, but to individuals not living in a state of society; for both are equally independent. Nor can this war between individuals be called a private war; because the word private can only be used in contra-distinction to the word public, which cannot apply where there exists no society. Wherever men are formed into a social body, war cannot exist between individuals; the use of force between them is not war, but a trespass, cognisable by the municipal law. Thus, if I extort from my debtor the ten pieces which he owes me, I incur the penalty of the Julian law against private force; because beating and wounding* do not alone constitute force in the sense of the prohibition, but it applies to every case in which a man obtains even what belongs to him, by any other than legal means. L. 7. ff. ad L. Jul. de vi privatâ.

War is a contest by force. I have not said by lawful force, for in my opinion, every force is lawful in war. Thus it is lawful to destroy an enemy, though he be unarmed and defenceless; it is lawful to make use against him of poison, of missile weapons, of firearms, though he may not be provided with any such means of attack or defence; in short, every thing is lawful against an enemy. I know that *Grotius is of a different opinion with regard to the use of poison, and that he distinguishes between the different kinds of missile weapons.† I know that Zouch, who hardly ever decides upon any point, is in doubt upon this question.‡ But if we take for our guide nature, that great teacher of the law of nations, we shall find that every thing is lawful against an enemy as such. We make war because we think that our enemy, by the injury that he has done us, has merited the destruction of himself and of all his adherents. As this is the object of our warfare, it is immaterial what means we embrace to accomplish it. A judge will not be called unjust who orders a convicted criminal to be put to death by the sword of the executioner, though he be unarmed and bound with chains; for if he should unbind and arm him, it would no longer be the punishment of a crime, but a trial of courage and good fortune. If you think that you ought only to make use of the same weapons against your enemy that he himself makes use of against you, you must at the same time be of opinion, that his cause is equally good with your own, and therefore that he is entitled to the same advantages. But on the contrary, your enemy stands with respect to you, in the situation of a condemned culprit; and so indeed you stand with respect to him; though in the eyes of third persons, who are friends to both parties, your cause and his are equally just, and you are both equally in the right.

Nor ought fraud to be omitted in a definition of war, as it is perfectly indifferent whether stratagem or open force be used against an enemy. There is, I know, a great diversity of opinion upon this subject: Grotius quotes a variety of authorities on both sides of the question.* For my part, I think that every species of deceit is lawful, perfidy only excepted; not that any thing may not lawfully be done against an enemy, but because, when a promise has been made to him, both parties are divested of the hostile character as far as regards that promise. And indeed when the reason of war admits of every mode to destroy an enemy, we cannot account for so many authorities and precedents against making use of fraud or deceit, but that as well the writers on the law of nations as the leaders of armies improperly confound justice, which is the object of our present inquiry, with generosity, which is not uncommon among warriors. Justice in war is indispensable; but generosity is altogether a voluntary act. That leaves us at liberty to destroy an enemy by every possible means; this grants to him every thing that we would wish to be granted to ourselves in the like case; and thus war is carried on as a duel formerly was in those countries in which that mode of terminating differences was admitted. Justice permits the use of numerous armies, of machines, firearms and other implements of war, that the enemy is not possessed of; while generosity, on the other hand, forbids it. Justice permits every kind of deceit, except perfidy, as I have before mentioned; generosity does not admit of it, perhaps even though it be employed by the enemy; for cunning is a token of fear, while the magnanimous mind is never afraid. St. Augustine says,* “that when a just war is undertaken, it is of no consequence whether it be carried on by fraud or open force.” This clearly applies to justice, and it is in fact justice that he treats of. But when the Roman consuls wrote to king Pyrrhus: “We do not wish to contend with you by means of bribery or fraud,”† and at the same time gave him notice of the offer that had been made to them to poison him, they certainly did an act of the greatest generosity.‡ Many nations have often preferred generosity to justice; others have preferred justice to generosity: the Romans themselves sometimes displayed the one, sometimes the other. If then, as I have said before, authorities and precedents are reconciled, the point will be clearly settled by recollecting that justice may always be insisted upon, though generosity may not.

Lastly, the definition says, for the sake of asserting their rights. That is to say, in order to defend or recover what is our own; for that is the sole cause, though I do not mean to say that it is the end or object, of war. A nation which has injured another, is considered, with every thing that belongs to it, as being confiscated to the nation that has received the injury. To carry that confiscation into effect may certainly be the object of the war, if the injured nation thinks proper; nor is the war to cease as soon as she has received a reparation or equivalent for the injury suffered. The whole commonwealth, and all the persons as well as the things contained within it, belong to the sovereign with whom we are at war, and in the same manner as we may seize upon the person and upon all the property of our debtor, so a sovereign in war may seize the whole of the subjects and dominions of his enemy. It is true that we can recover no more of a debtor than what he actually owes us; but in war all social ties are dissolved between states. We make war to subdue the enemy and all that belongs to him, by occupying every thing which belongs to the sovereign of the hostile country, and exercising dominion over all the men and things that are contained within his territories; for war is of so general a nature that it knows no measure or bounds.*

* The Translator has taken the liberty to transpose this paragraph for the sake of perspicuity. As it stands in the original, it ought to come in at the beginning of page 2, of this translation, but as it explains the last member of our author's definition, it seems best placed at the end. T.

CHAPTER II.

Of a Declaration of War.

MANY things are required by writers on the law of nations in order to make war lawful, and particularly, they think it necessary that it be publicly declared, either by a special proclamation or manifesto, or by sending a herald. This opinion certainly accords with the practice of the modern nations of Europe, and it is perfectly clear, that before recourse can be had to arms, a demand of satisfaction should be made for the injury complained of. But this is not the question now before us; it is whether after a reparation has been demanded and refused, war can be immediately made without a previous declaration?

*Albericus Gentilis is of opinion that it cannot; that a war ought not to be secretly commenced, and that the adverse party's friendship is to be publicly renounced. It is true that by the law of nature there is no necessity for a declaration of war. Grotius† is of that opinion and quotes several authorities in support of it. He contends only that the law of nations requires that a demand should be made, by which it may appear that the party is forced into a war by the refusal of a satisfaction which cannot be otherwise obtained. As to declarations of war,‡ he thinks they have been introduced in order that it should appear that the hostilities which are committed are the acts of the whole nation, or of the sovereign, and not merely of daring individuals. Puffendorff§ and Huberus|| are of the same opinion, and support it by the same arguments. Other writers, and among them Gentilis¶ and Zouch, think that a declaration of war is necessary, but that it may be dispensed with in certain cases. Hertius†† does not deny that the custom of declaring war has been handed down to us by the Germans, but at the same time he is of opinion, that that custom is not obligatory, and that nothing can be said of those who do not conform to it but that they are not to be considered as the most civilized nations.

Christian Thomasius,* a man of sound judgment, considers, in my opinion very properly, a declaration of war as an act of mere humanity, to which no one can be compelled; and he asks, with reason, what difference there is between a war that has and one that has not been declared, and whether there is a different law for the one and for the other? He does not agree with Grotius,† who, quoting a passage from Dion Chrysostom “that wars most frequently take place without a previous declaration,” is of opinion that such wars are lawful only by the law of nature. On the contrary, he asserts that they are justified by the law of nations, and immediately afterwards he adds, that this is a question of so interesting a nature that it deserves to be made the subject of a special dissertation.

I shall not, however, undertake to write a dissertation upon it, but I shall devote to its investigation the contents of the present chapter. My opinion is that a declaration of war is not necessary, and that it is one of those things which may very properly be done, but which cannot be insisted upon as a matter of right. A war may begin by mutual hostilities as well as by a declaration. The states-general appear to have understood it so, when by their ordinance of the 17th of January 1665 they declared, that the Dutch ships taken by the English might be claimed, because they had been captured before a declaration of war, and before the commencement of hostilities on the part of the Dutch. War may be justly begun upon the denial of a just demand; for how does that differ from actual hostility? I admit, in the fullest extent, that it is necessary in the first instance to make a demand of what we conceive to be due to us, but not that we are to accompany that demand with threats of hostility, or with an actual declaration of war. What Grotius says about interpellatio applies to a demand only; but what he says afterwards about a public declaration, denunciatio, cannot be applied in like manner. Nevertheless, it was from his and other's prejudices, although not at all consonant to reason, that this subject, otherwise very clear, began to become obscure. Yet it must have been evident, that where there is no judge between the parties, as is the case with princes, every one may forcibly retake that which belongs to him and has been unjustly taken away from him by another, who refuses to make restitution. This being the case, every one is at liberty to make or not as he pleases a declaration of war; the necessity of such a solemnity can only have been established by an agreement which between nations has no obligatory force.*

Nations however, and princes, who are impressed with sentiments of magnanimity, are not willing to make war without a previous declaration. They wish by an open and manly attack to render victory more glorious and more honourable. But here I must repeat the distinction between justice and generosity, which I have laid down in the preceding chapter: the former permits the use of force without any previous notice; the latter considers every thing in a nobler point of view, deems it inglorious to subdue an unarmed and unprepared enemy, and considers it an unworthy act to attack and despoil of a sudden those who have come among us on the faith of the public peace, which happens to be suddenly broken, perhaps without their fault. Hence Polybius, l. 13. c. 1., praises very highly the custom of declaring war, which was peculiar to the Achaians and to the Romans, and he praises them in the same manner for abstaining from fraud and deceit in war; but his praise in both instances is due only to their generosity.

Speaking of the Achaians, Polybius adds, that they had also appointed a particular place to fight their battles in, precisely as we read of certain counts of Holland, who in ancient times, when they intended to go to war, not only gave notice of it by a public declaration, but appointed the time and place of combat. This appointment of time and place *Grotius himself acknowledges to be unnecessary, and yet he urges a declaration as if it were indispensable. If you inquire into the reason of this difference, you will find no other but that it is not at present customary in Europe to appoint the time and place of combat. Whence it appears, that Grotius, in writing his book on the law of war and peace, has not so much written of the universal law of nations, as of the customs and manners of most of the European countries, which, as he himself teaches us,† do not constitute the law of nations. But on other points as well as on the present he has extracted the law of nations from customs and manners alone; so that when he has found these to differ on any particular question, he has hardly ever ventured to decide upon it.

* Non nisi conventionē, quę inter Gentes nulla est. Our author probably means here that such an agreement has no force, except between the parties to it; otherwise, he would appear at variance with himself. See pp. 3. 13. 17

From what Polybius said, however, that it was an honour peculiar to the Achaians and Romans that they did not make war without a previous declaration, we sufficiently understand that what is said by Dion Chrysostom, that war is most frequently NOT declared‡, is certainly true; not merely because it is not required by the law of nature, but because such is the custom or usage of nations. And indeed a declaration of war was not so frequent among other nations, as among the Romans and Achaians. Nor was such a declaration made by either party when the other nations of Greece waged war with the barbarians or with one another; nor do we read of the Jews, who went to war by God's command, that they ever declared war against their enemies. Neither did the Macedonians make a public declaration of war when they destroyed with so much glory the empire of the Persians. Even at this day, as far as I have been able to learn, none but the European nations declare war; nor even do they all or always do it, but they are accustomed so to do after the example of the Romans, for no other reason perhaps than because the Romans did so before them. For such was the estimation in which the Romans have been held among the nations of Europe, that not only their laws, but their manners and customs have been adopted among us, although those customs, as for instance that of declaring war which we are speaking of, differed from those of the rest of the world. Wherefore, if any sovereign of Europe should make war without previously declaring it, as was done by Gustavus Adolphus upon the Germans in the last century, he would certainly act contrary to the general custom of European nations, but none would say that he acted in opposition to the law of nations, except those who call by that name every thing which they see done in their own country.

† L. 2. c. 8. § 1. n. 1 & 2.

‡ In the original, this passage from Dion Chrysostom is quoted so as to mean, that war is most frequently DECLARED, (bella indicta ἐπὶ τὸ πλεῖστον, ut plurimum) but from the context it appears evidently to have been an error of the press. The words of Chrysostom are: πόλιμοι ὡς ἐπὶ τὸ πλεῖστον ἈΚΗΡΥΚΤΟΙ γίγονται. Wars are most frequently made WITHOUT a public declaration, and so our author translates them very correctly above, page 7. T.

But let us consult reason, whose authority is of so much weight in the law of nations. Reason, as I have before said, does not require any other formalities than that we should demand in a friendly manner what has been taken from us; nor perhaps will it even require that amicable demand; because all laws permit the repelling force by force, nor do I know that any solemnity in order to repel force is known to the law of nations. But admitting that among good men it may be proper or necessary to make a previous request; yet if that should be denied, will it be prohibited to make use of force? I surely do not prohibit it, though Grotius and others do, unless a declaration of war be previously made. But the arguments which are commonly made use of in support of the necessity of declaring war amount in fact to nothing. That which is adduced by Gentilis is reprobated by Grotius himself,* while he gives another, which I have already quoted, and which if not the worst of all is certainly a very bad one.

When two sovereigns commit hostilities against each other without having declared war, can we doubt that it is their mutual will to make war? If we cannot doubt it, to what purpose would their declaration be? When a thing is public and notorious, it certainly requires no proof. That is not therefore a sufficient argument, and yet Grotius has preferred making use of it in order to deduce the necessity of declaring war, from its being commonly done among European nations, though he well knew that that was not sufficient to constitute the general law. Reason alone, reason is the soul of the law of nations, and if we take her for our guide in the present discussion, no argument will be found to prove the necessity of a declaration of war, but many on the contrary, which I have adduced, to shew that it is not necessary.

But even if this question were to be decided by the customs of European nations, authorities can also be quoted from that source. To recur back to the precedents of ancient times would be an endless task. That war of extermination which was carried on between Spain and the United Provinces, from the time of the foundation of our republic until the year 1648, was begun by mutual hostilities, without any public declaration. Because therefore no such declaration was made, will the legality of the war, of the victories and of the peace which followed in 1648 be doubted? I do not think that it will. But the states of Holland seem to have thought otherwise, when on the 4th of March 1600 they published an edict declaring that the owners of the ships which Philip III. had confiscated in Spain in 1658 should have satisfaction, because the Dutch before that time resorted freely to Spain, and those ships had been confiscated without any previous warning. I do not approve of this edict, for who could justly have required the king of Spain to declare war, when the Dutch since the year 1581 had not ceased publicly to commit hostilities against him? War, in fact, properly begins from the mutual use of force, not to speak of other cases* mentioned by the publicists which fall within the same reason.

In the preamble of this edict, as well as in the edict itself, the states-general add, that formerly, that is to say prior to the year 1598, the *Belgians were allowed a free intercourse with Spain. But of the truth of this fact I have never been able to satisfy myself, and admitting it to be true, I cannot see how it applies to the justice of the present case, as I shall shew hereafter. If the Belgians thus carried on a free trade and intercourse with Spain, it could not be by force of the laws of war, but rather by the negligence of the magistrates. Indeed it is stated in the preamble to the edict, by which on the 4th of April 1586, the earl of Leicester, with the advice of the states-general and their counsellors, prohibited the United Belgians from trading with the Spaniards, that the king of Spain had already condemned and sold Belgic vessels, both in Spain and Portugal. And in the first section of the said edict of 1586, as well as by another edict of the 18th of July in the same year, the earl of Leicester actually forbids all commercial intercourse with the Spaniards. It is true, that by the first section of the edict of the 4th of August following he restricted the prohibition to trading with those places within the Belgic territory, which were in the possession of Spain, and permitted carrying on trade with Spain proper; but this was done for no other cause than for the advantage of the Belgic merchants, which brought no alteration in the laws of war, which could not be changed without the consent of the Spaniards.

Even if a declaration of war had been necessary, it would not have availed the Belgians any thing to prevent the condemnation of their vessels. For what if the Spaniards in that very year 1598 had solemnly declared war against the Belgians, and immediately afterwards condemned their vessels, perhaps the same day? They might have done this conformably to the laws of war; nor indeed are the Belgians or any other power, when a war suddenly breaks out, in the habit of giving notice to the subjects of their enemies to withdraw their effects and property, or otherwise that they shall be forfeited. No one ever required this; on the contrary, Tryphonius, in l. 12. pr.

* Our author, when referring to the times of the Dutch revolution, calls indiscriminately Dutch and Belgians those Netherlanders, who were in insurrection against Spain. Several of the now Belgic provinces were at times in possession of the insurgents.

ff. de Capt. & Postlim. Revers., lays down the contrary position. And such is the practice of all nations, unless there be a special convention to the contrary, which is sometimes the case. There are a few examples of similar compacts. In the fourth article of the treaty of Utrecht with Muyden and Weesp,* of the 1st of July 1463, it was agreed that the peace should last fourteen days, after we the said city and cities shall have written to each other, within which fourteen days it shall be lawful for our respective subjects to withdraw their goods and effects from the territory of their enemies. In the sixteenth article of the treaty of peace between the king of Portugal and the States-general, of the 6th August 1661, it is stipulated, that if differences shall arise between the said king and states, it is so to be declared, and within two years from that declaration it will be unlawful to do an injury to the property of the subjects of either party. After it had been agreed in the year 1662 between France and the states-general, that in case of a war taking place the subjects of either party should be allowed six months to withdraw their property from the territory of the other, the king of France having declared war against the Dutch in the year 1672 issued a special edict declaring that the convention of 1662 should be observed. The same term of six months was granted for the same purpose by the same powers to each other by the fifteenth article of the peace of Nimeguen, of the 10th of August 1678, nine months by the thirty-ninth article of the marine treaty of the 10th of August 1678, nine months again by the fourteenth article of the treaty of peace of the 20th of September 1697, and again nine months by the thirty-sixth article of the treaty of peace of the 11th of April 1713. And in the thirty-second article of the treaty of peace between England and the states-general, of the 31st of July 1667, it was stipulated, that if war should arise between the parties, the effects of their respective subjects found in the territories of each other should not be condemned, but six months should be allowed to take them away. If these examples should not be sufficient, I could adduce several others mentioned by Zentgravius, de Orig. Verit. & Oblig. Jur. Gent. art. 7. § 9. Where, however, there do not exist similar conventions for suspending the state of war, whatever others may say, hostilities may commence immediately. Grotius, who requires a declaration, does not require any interval between it and the beginning of hostilities. See l. 3. De Jure B. & P. c. 3. § 13. Zouch and Zentgravius are of the same opinion. Zouch, de Jur. int. gent. part 1. § 6.* and Zent. d. loc. The king of Spain, therefore, might in the year 1598 have declared war and immediately afterwards taken the Dutch ships, as there was no convention between the two powers to the contrary, nor indeed could there be any between that sovereign and a people whom he considered as his subjects.

Here then is a remarkable instance of a war carried on for a great length of time without ever having been declared. Indeed, I do not know how the Belgians could have required a declaration of war from the Spaniards, when they themselves never issued any, either at the commencement of hostilities, or when they were resumed after the expiration of truces. Nay, even admitting that such a declaration was indispensably required by the law of nations, the Spaniards might perhaps have objected that it was only necessary when war took place between independent princes, but that it was never used in a civil war, in which case it was perfectly lawful for a sovereign to take the property of his rebel subjects. But I do not urge this argument. It is sufficient for my purpose if I make it appear that the edict of the 4th of March 1600 was not predicated on the laws of war, but on the interest of the Dutch merchants. It was the same interest which influenced the Hollanders in the year 1639, and set them improperly at variance with the states-general, in another case which was no less dependent on the laws of war. For the governor of the

* Our author here quotes Zouch, § 3. Q. 10. without referring to the part. It is evidently a misquotation. The true reference (which we have restored) is to part 1. § 6.

Canary Islands having been taken by treachery and brought into this country, and the states-general being desirous of detaining him as a prisoner, the Hollanders opposed it; but, says Aitzema,* merely on the ground of its being detrimental to their trade. For my part I think that they might well have founded their opposition on the merits of the case itself: as this was a much more shameful act than the condemnation of the Dutch vessels by Philip II. in 1598; for although an enemy's property may be taken and hostilities may be committed immediately upon a declaration of war, if there are no treaties to the contrary, yet it is in no case lawful to betray a friend. The Dutch had hitherto been admitted to trade freely with the Canary Islands, and there was on both sides a free commercial intercourse. A Dutch captain, who had been thus admitted to trade, persuaded the governor to go on board of his vessel, under pretence of carrying him from one island to another, instead of which he carried him to Rotterdam in order to make him a prisoner. This appears to me to be precisely the same as going to an enemy under the protection of a flag of truce, with an intention however to seize upon the first favourable opportunity to take away his life.

* Lib. 19. As this writer is frequently quoted in the course of this work, we think it proper to give some account of his writings to the American reader. LEO VAN AITZEMA is the author of an excellent Chronicle of the events which took place during the middle part of the seventeenth century, from 1621 to 1668. This work is published in six thick folio volumes, (with an additional volume containing political tracts,) and contains an immense collection of state papers, during the period to which it refers, which are connected together by the author's narrative. It is divided into books, each book containing a recital of the public events and a copy of the public documents of one year. It has been ably continued on the same plan by L. Sylvius, in four folio volumes, down to the peace of Ryswick, in 1697. This book, as well as its continuation, is entitled Saken van Staet en Oorlogh, (Of matters of State and War). Unfortunately it is written in the Low Dutch language, which is understood but by few among us. A translation of it into English would be a great acquisition to literature, and prove an invaluable mine of historical knowledge. From the manner in which the public documents that it contains are connected and introduced by short historical narratives, it is superior to any collection of state papers that has ever appeared. It combines the advantages of such a collection with those of a chronicle of the times, which, we believe, are not to be found together in any other work extant. There are two editions of Aitzema, one in folio, the other in quarto. The latter is that from which our author has taken his quotations, to the paging of which he refers. Being possessed only of the folio edition, we have thought it best to refer merely to the book in which each particular passage is to be found. T.

But let us pass on to other wars commenced and carried on without any declaration. It is well known that when Gustavus Adolphus invaded Germany, the emperor Ferdinand II. complained that he had done it without a previous declaration of war, upon which Gustavus replied that the emperor himself had before invaded Prussia without any such declaration. It is thus that princes, though bound by no positive law, enforce upon each other the law of reciprocity. The same thing happened in the year 1657; for the French, in the midst of peace, having detained the goods of Dutch subjects which they had in their own country, the Dutch detained in like manner the goods of French subjects. See the edict of the states of Holland of the 26th April, and the decree of the states-general of the 6th of May of that year. Indeed the states-general lay it down in their said decree that such a detention among friends is unlawful, unless for a just cause, and unless there has been a previous demand and denial of justice. But no prince will detain the property of foreigners, unless for a cause which he himself thinks just. Certainly I would admit of a demand, because a cause of complaint cannot otherwise be known; but since the common use of resident ambassadors, which now obtains, there can be but few cases of injury of which a complaint is not made; for ambassadors are in the habit of making frequent representations, if the smallest thing happens by which their sovereign may be offended. But let us proceed.

We read of the Portuguese, that in the year 1657 they seized the ships of the Dutch before any war declared or hostilities commenced. And in the war which took place between the king of England and the states-general, which ended in the peace of 1667, the states-general, in the letter which they wrote to the king of England on the 16th of September 1666, complained that a great deal of property was taken from them and their subjects; unlawfully, said they, because war had not been declared. But of this the reader will judge from the reasonings which I here adduce. Louis XIV. also, in the year 1667, did not declare war against the Spaniards, and yet, as it were, without breaking the peace, he ordered the king of Spain to be expelled from dominions that he was possessed of, being of opinion that there was no need of a declaration to take what belonged to him. Now, if a declaration is necessary in any case, who, I ask, will put up with such a pretext? For to make war is nothing else than to take forcibly from an unwilling prince or people what we think to be justly due to us. There is a long complaint on this subject in the edict of the states-general against France, of the 9th of March 1689,* because the same king of France had, in the year 1688, without any declaration of war, detained the Dutch subjects and their ships and merchandize, and afterwards, immediately on the declaration of war being published at Paris, he took up arms, and seized on the goods of Dutch subjects.

The first part of this complaint was indeed just; for that detention was a violation of the fifteenth article of the peace of Nimeguen and of the thirty-ninth article of the Marine treaty of the 10th of August 1678, the period stipulated by those several instruments, as above mentioned, for carrying off the effects of the respective parties, not being expired, so that the state of war was in this respect suspended. It was therefore an act of injustice to capture such goods as might have been carried off within the limited time. As to other goods, there was no treaty concerning them, and therefore I doubt whether the second part of the complaint was equally well founded. But however this may be, the instances which I have adduced are sufficient to prove that there is no reason why we should think so favourably of European manners, as to refer to them for a convincing proof of the necessity of declaring war.

* Sylv. contin. of Aitzema, b. 25.

CHAPTER III.

Of War considered as between Enemies.

IT may be said that a state of war ought rather to exist among princes for whose interest alone in most cases it is carried on, than among their subjects, who, unless the war is made for their own quarrel, are not actuated by so hostile a spirit. Yet when hostilities are to be waged against another nation, no one can expect that we shall compliment our enemies and wish them well. The grave majesty of the Roman people displayed itself in the conduct of Caius Popilius, who, although he was saluted by king Antiochus, then his enemy, refused to return the salutation while the war continued. So we are told by Plutarch, Apophthegm, p. m. 364.: Livy, b. 45. c. 12., and Polyb. Excerpt. Legat. c. 92., relate likewise, that Antiochus offered his hand to Popilius, who refused to take it.

The Roman consuls however, in their letter to king Pyrhus, with whom they were at war, as related by Gellius, b. 3. c. 8., wished him health. This perhaps was necessitated by the state of Roman affairs at that time, but so addicted to flattery has the last century been, as well as the present, that princes omit none of the usual adulatory forms even in the midst of war. Hence enemies now wish to each other every kind of prosperity, call each other friends, and are almost sorry for their mutual losses. This is exemplified in the letters of the states-general to the king of England, of the 10th of July,* 16th September,† and 26th of November, 1666; and again in the letters of the king of England to the states-general of the 4th of August,‡ and 4th of October 1666. Although the two nations were at that time at open war, and bent upon mutual injury, yet the states-general write in their said letter of the 10th of July 1666, que les offices de civilité ne sont pas incompatibles avec les devoirs de la guerre,—that an interchange of civilities is not incompatible with the duties of war. And the king of France, in the year 1666, who was then at war with the king of England, sent an ambassador to condole with him on the conflagration of the city of London. It is certainly noble to practise the duties of humanity, clemency, piety and other magnanimous virtues in the midst of war; but I think it disgusting to trifle with mere words, for what else is it than trifling when you express sorrow for the conflagration of a city to which you would wish to set fire yourself?

As the conqueror may lawfully do any thing that he pleases with the vanquished, no one can doubt his having on that account over him the power of life and death. There are so many instances on record of the exercise of this right amongst all nations in ancient times, that a large book would not be sufficient to contain an account of them all; and the publicists have already exercised their industry upon this subject. But although the right of killing has almost become obsolete, yet it is to be attributed merely to the will and to the clemency of the victor; nor can it be denied but that it might be exercised even at this time, if one should chuse to avail himself of his right. That there still exist some remains of this right is in full proof; for in this sense alone is to be taken and on this ground alone is to be defended the edict of the states-general of the 1st of October 1589, which inflicted the penalty of death on those who should be found with the traitors of Gertruydenberg; and also their other edict of the 24th February 1696, by which they inflicted the same penalty on those enemies who should approach the shore nearer than the buoys, or should land on the coast for the sake of plundering.

One who is in company with his fellow soldiers is not guilty of any crime by the laws of war, though they be traitors, nor is he who invades a hostile shore in hopes of making booty. Drive him away if you can, but if you cannot, why will you treat him differently from other enemies? It is on the ground of the same right of life and death that I defend the conduct of the Dutch,* who sometimes hanged the Spaniards because they were not ransomed, for so it is related to us. It is lawful to hang prisoners; but if it were not lawful, there is no reason or authority for doing it because they are not ransomed, but the contrary is practised, as will be seen hereafter.

* Aitz. b. 6.

duke of *Berwick gave him notice, that if this should be done, all the prisoners that he should make would be sent to the galleys in France. But as slavery itself has fallen entirely into disuse among christians, we do not inflict it upon our prisoners. We may however, if we please, and indeed we do sometimes still exercise that right upon those who enforce it against us. Therefore the Dutch are in the habit of selling to the Spaniards as slaves, the Algerines, Tunisians and Tripolitans, whom they take prisoners in the Atlantic or in the Mediterranean; for the Dutch themselves have no slaves, except in Asia, Africa and America. Nay, in the year 1661, the states-general gave orders to their admiral to sell as slaves all the pirates that he should take. The same thing was done in the year 1664.†

To the slavery of prisoners succeeded the custom of exchanging them according to their respective grades and ranks, and detaining them until redeemed.‡ And the necessity of redeeming them is sometimes expressed in treaties, with a specified sum, according to the dignity of each person that may be taken, which sum being paid, there is an end of that summum jus which belongs to the victors over their prisoners. Among the Romans the right of capture was exercised upon those who at the breaking out of the war were found in each other's territory, l. 12. ff. de Capt. et. Postlim. Revers.; but in modern times it rarely takes place, although the right still exists. Nay, Louis XIV. himself, king of France, when on the 26th of January 1666, he had declared war against England by sea and land, and interdicted all commerce between

* The duke of Berwick, a natural son of James II. of England, commanded at that time the French army in Ireland. He was afterwards commander in chief of the French forces in Spain, during the succession war, while the British troops were commanded by the earl of Galway, a Frenchman.
T.

† Aitz. b. 41. 44.

‡ We are informed by the public papers that by a late cartel which has been settled between the British and French, sixteen French prisoners are to be given for every nine British, until the whole are regularly exchanged; it having been ascertained that the number of French prisoners in England exceeds that of the English in France in that proportion.

the two nations, in consequence of which the English who were in France were in fears for their persons and property, issued on the 1st of February 1666, another edict, telling them that their fears were vain; for that by the edict of the 26th of January 1666, he had merely declared war against those of the English who should be found thereafter on the high seas, or who should commit hostilities on the French territory, but not against those private individuals who had established their domicil in France; that however, it was his pleasure that English subjects residing in France, and who were not naturalized, should depart within three months, and go whithersoever they should please.

But that this is to be attributed solely to humanity, if there exist no treaties suspending the state of war, I have endeavoured to shew in the preceding chapter.* Because, however, there are many such treaties, the laws of war are seldom exercised upon those who have come in time of peace to a country where war afterwards has arisen, and have been found there at the time of the war's taking place. But after the expiration of the time which has been granted to them either by humanity or by treaty, those who remain in the country, or come into it without permission, may lawfully be arrested. On this principle, the states-general on the 4th of April 1674 issued an edict, that if any enemies should tarry within the United Provinces or the dominions of the states-general, without having obtained liberty to come, they should be arrested, and not be restored until redeemed.

But although the right of killing prisoners has fallen into disuse, it is made a question, however, whether it may not be, without the least imputation, exercised upon those who defend themselves too obstinately; and there are some who maintain the affirmative. But I think it would be a shameful action, unless the weak and defenceless girl, who obstinately

* On this principle, probably, the first consul of France arrested and detained, without any previous notice, all the British subjects who were found in France at the commencement of the present war. The principle may be correct; but if it is, it must be acknowledged that the summum jus of war is very near akin to barbarism.

Every thing is lawful against an enemy, but nothing can be more cruel than to punish him for his courage. Nay, we even admire the courage of our enemies, and we are indignant at their cowardice. I remember to have read, that the Algerine corsairs tore to pieces and loaded with every kind of ignominy a certain captain who had meanly given up his vessel when she was in a condition very fit for defence, and had only stipulated for the liberty of his own person. For even with enemies fortitude is glorious and cowardice contemptible. If you wish to read what others have written upon this subject, you may be gratified by reading Gentilis, de Jure Belli, l. 2. c. 16.; Grotius, de J. B. ac Pac. l. 3. c. 4. § 13., and *Zouch, de Jur. Fec. part 2. § 10. Q. 9.

We have laid down what it is lawful to do with living enemies, but what shall we say of the remains of those who are dead? In ancient times their bodies were abandoned to beasts and birds of prey, but now the conquerors either bury them themselves, or deliver them up to be buried. Sometimes even more is done for the sake of humanity. On the 16th of September 1666, the states-general caused the body of an English admiral which was in their power to be embalmed, and sent it over to England. They had before, viz. on the 10th of July 1666, written to the king of England, to know whether he wished that corpse to be sent thither or be buried in Holland, and on the 4th of August 1666 he chose the former. The French did the same thing in the year 1692.

There can be no doubt but that from the nature of war itself, all commercial intercourse ceases between enemies. For to what purpose will trade be carried on, if, as is clearly the case, the goods of enemies brought into our country are liable to confiscation? And if he who having obtained the right of killing his enemy should go with merchandize into the hostile country, and the enemy should kill him in the midst of commercial intercourse, would you think it justly done? But every commercial intercourse ceases. Hence in declarations of war commerce with the enemy is prohibited, and it is often done by subsequent edicts. By the eleventh section of the edict of the earl of Leicester of the 4th of April 1586, interdicting trade with the Spaniards, it is enacted that those who should carry on such commerce contrary to that edict should be hanged and their ships and goods confiscated, if they were subjects, but if foreigners, they should only be punished by the confiscation of their ships and merchandize. The same was enacted by the twelfth section of the edict of the said earl of the 4th of August 1586. And by the thirteenth section of the edict of the 4th of April, and the fourteenth of that of the 4th of August, the intention to carry on trade with the enemy was punished in the same manner as the fact itself, and thus the states of Holland had formerly enacted on the 27th of July 1584. It was moreover added to all those edicts, that there should be no prescription or limitation against the charge of having traded with the enemy, whether they were taken in the fact or not. And by the same edict of the states of Holland of the 27th of July 1584, the pecuniary penalties which it inflicts were to be recovered not only from the delinquent but from his heirs, which I do not believe to be conformable to the Roman law: for the offence provided against by these edicts does not, if we will be candid, amount to the crime of treason, but is a particular species of offence, to which one is instigated by cupidity and the love of gain rather than by a reasonable intent.

But although trading with the enemy be not specially prohibited, yet it is forbidden by the mere operation of the law of war. Declarations of war themselves sufficiently shew it; for they enjoin on every subject to attack the subjects of the other prince, seize on their goods, and do them all the harm in their power. The utility, however, of merchants, and the mutual wants of nations, have almost got the better of the law of war as to commerce. Hence it is alternately permitted and forbidden in time of war, as princes think it most for the interest of their subjects. A commercial nation is anxious to trade, and accommodates the laws of war to the greater or lesser want that it may be in of the merchandizes of others. Thus sometimes a mutual commerce is permitted generally; sometimes as to certain merchandizes only, while others are prohibited, and sometimes it is prohibited altogether. But in whatever manner it may be permitted, whether generally or specially, it is always, in my opinion, so far a suspension of the laws of war. And in this manner, there is partly war and partly peace between the subjects of both princes.* The herring fishery was permitted on both sides by the edicts of the French and Dutch of the year 1536, and formerly by the edict of the latter of the 22d of December 1552. To which is to be added, what was done during the whole of the Spanish, Portuguese and English war, in the years 1653, 1665 and 1672, and also during the French war in the years 1672, 1689 and 1702, for it would be too long to commemorate every thing.

It is a question whether our friends are to be considered as enemies, when they live among the latter, say in a town which they occupy. Petrinus Bellus, de Re Milit. part 2. tit. 11. n. 5., thinks that they are not. Zouch, de Jure Fec. part 2. § 8. Q. 4., gives no opinion. For my part I think that they must also be considered as enemies, certainly as to the goods which they have within the hostile territory, and therefore those goods may properly be taken by us by the law of war, if they have been before taken by our enemies. We may lawfully take all that belongs to the enemy, and those goods are a part of the enemy's dominion, which as they may be useful to them, may be hurtful to us. But if the goods of friends are within our territory, although their owners may be within that of the enemy, being detained there as prisoners by the law of war, I would then speak differently; because it is true that these are not the enemy's goods, nor can they be at all useful to him. Again, as we are to do to our enemies all the harm that we can,

* How is it, when, as in the present European war, the belligerents trade with each other, and prohibit neutrals from trading with their respective enemies? According to our author's opinion, it seems that such belligerents are so far at peace with one another, and at war with the neutral nations. T.

why shall we not take from them goods which they themselves have occupied by the law of war, and which they make use of as of their own? I know upon what principle others are of a different opinion.* They say that our friends, although they are among our enemies, yet are not hostilely inclined against us; for if they are there, it is not from their choice, and the quo animo only is to be considered. But the thing does not depend only on the quo animo; for, even among the subjects of our enemy, there are some, however few they may be, who are not hostilely inclined against us; but the matter depends upon the law, because those goods are with the enemy, and because they are of use to them for our destruction.

* Our author here distinguishes between the goods of a friend which are within our territory, while the friendly owner is a prisoner with the enemy, and those which having been captured by the enemy, as well as the person of the owner, are retaken by us. The latter, he contends, are, though the former are not, liable to confiscation. T

CHAPTER IV.

Of the Capture of movable property, and particularly of Ships.

WE have in the former chapters treated of the persons of enemies, we shall now speak of their goods and actions. It is evident that the enemy's property, whether movable or immovable, may be lawfully taken. To whose benefit the capture enures, whether to the private captors or to the state, I shall not now examine, as I am to consider this subject in the 20th chapter. But I shall at present attend to another question, which is not less important and which occurs every day, From what time is property changed by capture? I shall not distinguish here between the different species of personal property; whether a man be taken, or a ship, or merchandize, or furniture, or any thing else which may be properly the object of capture. By the Roman law, as Grotius very properly observes, the things taken are said to become the property of the captors, when they are carried intra præsidia,* for which doctrine there is no other reason, but that now every hope of pursuing and recovering the thing taken is at an end. "Whence," says the same author,† "it seems to follow, that ships and other things taken on the high seas, are considered as effectually captured, when they have been carried into a port or harbour, or in a place where the whole fleet is, for now their recovery begins to be despaired of. But," he adds, "by the modern law introduced among European nations, such things, in order to be considered as captured, must have been twenty-four hours in the power of the enemy." Which doctrine he applies in his notes to those things which are taken upon land. Zouch has stated Grotius's doctrine very fairly,* and Loccenius† has done the same. What Grotius says of the doctrine of twenty-four hours, that it is now observed among all nations, without any distinction, whether a captured ship has been carried or not into a port of the captors, the attorney-general in the court of admiralty of Amsterdam, has formerly answered,‡ and others are of the same opinion.

But I never have been able to find that this custom was observed. I have found, indeed, that the military judges decided thus on the 24th of December 1624,§ and also at another time, but of what weight is the decision of men, mostly ignorant of law, who either have not been guided by any authority or perhaps have been seduced by that of Grotius. What I shall say in this and the next chapter will abundantly prove that this custom is repugnant to the laws and manners of the United Provinces. I know, that in the year 1631, the ambassador of the states-general in England,¶ requested the states-general to sanction by their authority that principle of jurisprudence, which vests the property in a prize after twenty-four hours' just possession; but I do not find that the states ever did so. It is indeed contrary to all reason; for if you consider the thing by the mere light of common law, the true reason of a change of property consists in a real possession. But a real possession is that which may be safely retained. Then what signify the twenty-four hours, if there may be a real possession within that time, and if on the contrary a possession may even continue longer and not be real? Certainly it has been impossible to lay down a general rule upon this subject, on account of the great variety of cases that may happen; but every case is to be considered by itself, and from every case it will result, that the property of the thing taken will not vest in the captor, unless he is able to keep and defend it. Things taken in war, says the digest, belong to him who has first taken possession of them. L. 1. § 1. ff. de Acquir. vel Amitt. rer. Possess.

* De Jure Fec. part 2. § 8. Q. 1.—† De Jure Marit. 1. 2. c. 4. n. 4.—

And he is not considered as having the possession of a thing, who is not able to retain it. L. 22. ff. Eod. Such is the opinion of the most eminent jurists, which is dictated by the law of nations itself. When, however, we have such a possession that we may or may not retain the thing taken, the variety of cases is such, as I have said, that it is not possible to give any definition. We may, however, be considered as having a firm possession, when we have carried the thing taken intra præsidia, to use the language of the Roman law. By præsidia, we understand castles, ports, towns and fleets; for in any one of these the thing taken may be considered as safe, and in a situation to be defended.

But how can the twenty-four hours be sufficient, if it is not even sufficient, in order to change the property, that the captured thing should have been carried intra præsidia? For such is the mistaken idea of some, nay, of those whose authority otherwise is of the greatest weight. They are of opinion, that captured ships do not become the property of the captors, unless they have been carried into one of his ports and condemned there, and afterwards have freely navigated to a neutral port. Of merchandizes and other things, which are within the same reason, they might have said the same thing, but I believe they were ashamed. I well know what the states-general decreed concerning captured vessels on the 27th of November 1666: "That if ships, taken by the enemy and carried into England, and the kingdoms thereto belonging, and there condemned as prize, and purchased by neutrals, should be captured by Dutch ships on their way from the enemy's ports, either in ipso actu or afterwards, before arriving at their port of destination or at some other free port, such ships should then and therefore be declared good prize, as was usual in ancient times, and agreeably to the disposition of the fourth point of the *case stated of the 26th of June 1630, mutatis mutandis." I have quoted the precise words of the decree, that I may not be thought to relate incredible things. You will wonder, indeed for my part I certainly do wonder, what it can signify, whether the ships have arrived or not into one of the ports of the purchaser, or into some other friendly port. This national or friendly port must then give, I know not how, I know not what, to I know not whom. It would not give a right of property to the enemy, who already had taken and sold the prize, nor to the purchaser, who had thus purchased our own property from one who was not the rightful owner thereof. Then that certain port of the neutral purchaser or of his friend would actually be the thing that would take the property of the vessel from us. If recourse was to be had to a fiction, it would have been better to suppose that the vessel became enemy's property by the enemy's capture, remained such until it was purged of that taint, and that it could not be so purged until it had entered the port of the neutral or of one of his friends, until which time it might be lawfully retaken. But such a fiction would not have been legal, because by the act of purchase the thing belongs to the purchaser, nor is it material whether it was originally his, or whether it became his property by capture and condemnation.

But observe how improperly ancient custom is appealed to, and see that other decree of the states-general of the 26th of June 1630, which is supposed to have given rise to that custom. That decree was made on a case stated by the admiralty of Amsterdam, which contained several questions, to the fourth of which the states answer thus:

“ On the fourth point their high mightinesses declare, that ships taken by the enemy, carried into Flanders, and purchased by neutrals, but which shall be taken in the very act of coming out of the enemy's ports or on their way from them, before they have been into their own or in other free ports, shall be lawful prize, as has always been the custom in ancient times, by virtue of the right herein before alleged as to the first point; and likewise such vessels, which being so captured and purchased, and having run out of the said Flemish ports into other ports under the dominion of the king of Spain, and coming from thence, shall be captured by Dutch ships.”

That this decree is very foreign to that cause appears from the case stated itself; and the states-general themselves, by referring to the first head of the decree,* sufficiently make known what was their reason for enacting it. The fact is, that for the sake of preventing commercial intercourse, the states-general had blocked up the ports of Flanders with ships of war, so that all vessels, to whomsoever belonging, bound to those ports, or sailing from them, were condemned by them as lawful prize; because by the law of nations and according to the principles of reason it is not lawful to carry any thing to a blockaded port, nor to take any thing away from it. Therefore the admiralty said, and the states-general decreed, that the same law applied to vessels which had been before taken from us and afterwards sold, because it was lawful to take even the ships of friends when trading with blockaded ports; which is true so far, that is, if they are taken before their voyage is ended, and while employed in the illicit trade, for the voyage is not considered as completed until the vessels have entered into their own or a friendly port.

This and nothing else was what the states-general had in view by the said decree of the 26th of June 1630, and on these principles, that of the 27th of November 1666 would have been very proper, if in that year the whole of England, Scotland and Ireland, and all the British dominions in Asia, Africa and America had been blockaded by the fleets of the states-general. It is indeed related, that in the year 1652 they boasted of a similar thing with regard to the English, having prohibited all trade with them to all the world.† But upon what foundation they so boasted I do not now inquire. I content myself with observing, that the same states-general in 1663 denied to the Spaniards, who pretended to blockade the whole of Portugal, that same right which they had before arrogated to themselves against the English. These facts are so recorded in Aitzema's chronicle.‡

* That is to say, the first point of the case stated, on which the states made their decree. What that first point was, does not precisely appear, though it may be gathered from the context of our author's observations on the whole decree.

T.

† Aitz. B. 32.—‡ Aitz. B. 43.

From thence it appears, that the said decree of the states-general of the 27th of November 1666 cannot be defended. And indeed if we once admit the principles of that decree, a number of monstrous consequences will necessarily follow: for as the poet says, “ Si prava est regula prima,

“ Omnia mendose fieri atque obstipa necesse est.”

It will manifestly follow, that all enemy's goods, without exception, will be placed in precisely the same predicament; for whatever enemies have by capture is as much their own as what they have by succession, purchase, or by any other title. Therefore the same is to be said, not only, as I observed before, of merchandize and other things which enemies have taken from us, but also of ships, and every thing else which they have otherwise than by taking it from us, and which our friends have purchased from them. If this be admitted, we must also admit that it is lawful for princes to interdict their enemies from the use of fire and water, and to forbid all the world from carrying on a commercial intercourse with them, which hitherto has only been done so far as relates to those things which are called contraband: for all things of that kind which our friends may purchase of our enemies, may lawfully be taken and confiscated, unless they have been carried into a neutral port.

But it is unreasonable to infer a general rule from a law which, against the principles of reason, has been established in a particular case, by which means a pretence will be given to every sovereign to commit injustice. On this and no other ground was founded the edict of Louis XIV. king of France, of the 17th of September 1672, by which he ordered the capture and confiscation of all vessels, even purchased by his friends in the United Provinces and found coming from thence. In consequence of that edict, on the next day a certain vessel was condemned which had been taken coming from Holland, where she had been built and purchased by Hamburghers, manned with a Hamburgh crew, and was going to Hamburgh. To that edict of the king of France, the states-general, that they might not appear to do less harm to their friends, (for such things fall upon the heads of friends) replied by an edict in which they decreed "that all ships purchased by neutrals within the dominions of the king of France, although manned with a neutral crew, which sailing for the first time from the enemy's ports, and not yet having been in the neutral port to which they were bound, should fall into the hands of Dutch cruizers, should be lawful prize." One would think that this edict was founded on the law of retaliation; but retaliation is only to be exercised on him who has committed the injury, and not against a common friend. Therefore the edict of the states-general of the 29th of November 1666 cannot be defended on the ground that the English had before acted with a greater degree of injustice when their ambassador, on the 23d of December 1664, gave notice to the Hanse-Towns, who were in amity then both with England and the states-general, that all the ships which they should purchase in the territory of the United Provinces should, without distinction of voyage, be considered as enemies.* He who has done no injury ought not in justice to suffer.

Moreover, from those decrees of the states-general of 1630 and 1666, one might think that it appears that those things which our friends have purchased from our enemies cannot be taken from them, if they have once been carried into a neutral port, as they say that such things may be lawfully condemned, "before they have been into their own or some other neutral port:" but so much does not even sufficiently appear. The admiralty of Amsterdam had consulted the states-general upon this subject, but nothing was decided upon it; for the states simply answered by their letter of the 26th of June 1630, "As to ships taken by the enemy from the inhabitants of this country, carried into Flanders and there condemned, which without being taken should be carried into England, France, or other neutral countries, and should be captured by our ships on their way from thence on other free voyages, we ought to have some short time to consider, whether or not they should be declared lawful prize, requesting that in the mean time you will communicate to us the sentences that have been given in similar cases, and the decisions that have taken place thereon in other countries."

On this same question I find that the court of Holland was consulted in the following year, 1631; but I do not know what answer they gave. But although the Dutch lawyers, requested to give their opinions on the same point, on the 25th of January 1636, answered very properly and upon true legal principles, "that our ships, taken by the enemy and purchased by neutrals, became by the very act of capture the property of the enemy, and therefore lawfully belonged to those who purchased from him," there have nevertheless been since that time disputes upon that subject.* But that this doubt of the states-general in the year 1630 may not hereafter occasion any prejudice, when similar cases shall arise, I must repeat what I have said above, that they had a special case before them, that the question was concerning the blockaded Flemish ports, which not being attended to, has involved the point in obscurity; but that from thence it would not be proper to argue as to ports which were not blockaded, and to and from which a free ingress and egress was permitted. The decree of the 27th of November 1666 is sufficiently iniquitous, let us not therefore add to it another injustice, which was not in fact such, because founded on a special case.

But if the states-general had meant to say, that the property of a prize is not altered, unless it has been carried into the enemy's port, and has afterwards freely sailed from thence and arrived into the port of a friend, what ground or reason would there be for their edicts, by which, in case of recapture of our vessels taken by the enemy, they allow a part to the recaptor and a part to the original owner? If mere capture transfers the property, what right remains to the former owner? if not, what right has the recaptor to a certain part, when the former owner may reclaim his property? I should think for my own part with many others, that no right remains in him, and so is the usage among all nations. These are things that can neither be reconciled with the decree of the 27th of November 1666, nor with law, nor with common sense.

* Aitz. b. 21.; Id. b. 23.

CHAPTER V.

Of the Recapture of movable Property.

WHAT I have lightly touched upon at the end of the last chapter, I am now going to consider and discuss more at large. Whereupon it is to be observed, that immovable property, when recaptured, returns to the former owners by postliminy, but that movables which we now treat of do not so return. It is thus laid down by Labeo, in l. 28. de Capt. & Postlim. Revers: Si quid bello captum est, in præda est, non postliminio redit. "If any thing be taken in war, it is a prize, and does not return by postliminy." As to ships, however, although they are considered as movables, he distinguishes, l. 2. pr. ff. eod., that such ships as may be of use in war return by postliminy, but others not. But this and other distinctions of the Roman law between movable things have become obsolete by the gradual change of manners, as Grotius justly observes.* Hence now movable goods, without any distinction, are prize, without any right of postliminy. As a consequence from this it has been inferred that goods taken by the enemy, and afterwards recaptured, vest in the recaptors; because, as capture, in time of war, transfers the property, so recapture must of course transfer it in like manner. But we do not recapture for ourselves, except those things which have pleno jure become enemy's property; for if they have not, the former owner may still vindicate his right. As to the time when movable goods are considered pleno jure as having become the enemy's property, it depends on the circumstances which I have treated of in the preceding chapter.

Although the definition of this thing is very uncertain, so much, however, is most true, that movable goods carried intra præsidia† of the enemy, become clearly and fully his property, and consequently, if retaken, vest entirely in the recaptors. The same is to be said of ships, carried into the enemy's ports, and afterwards recaptured, so that no property or right to them remains in the former owner, as I mentioned at the end of the preceding chapter. On these principles, the agreement which was made on the 22d of October 1689, between the king of England and the states-general, then allies in war, that each other's ships when recaptured should be restored to the former owner, on payment of a certain salvage, has been construed to apply only to cases where the ships had not been carried into the ports of the enemy, for otherwise they are to be entirely the property of the recaptors.

So far is sufficiently clear, but what is not equally so is what is to be understood by præsidia, or ports? Is it the ports of those who have taken the ship, or of their allies? It may be said that it is enough if they are carried into the ports of the latter, provided they are their allies in the existing war, and equally with themselves the enemies of those whose vessels have been taken. Prizes are equally safe in the ports of such an ally, as in those of the captor himself, and there is no hope of retaking them, unless they should sail again out of that port. But when the French had taken two Hamburg ships, on the 28th of December 1675, in which were the goods of Amsterdam merchants, and had had them fourteen days in their possession, and afterwards carried them into the port of Hull in England,* I find that the states-general entertained a different opinion. The admiralty of Dunkirk, before the return of the French, had condemned the said ships and their cargoes, and the French had even sold a part of the goods at Hull; and as the ships, with the remainder of the goods, were on their way to Dunkirk, they were taken by the Zealanders, carried into Zealand, and there condemned. But the states-general, being applied to by the Amsterdam merchants, did, on the 23d of October 1676, decree, that the recaptured goods should be restored to their former owners, because they had not yet been carried into the ports of the enemy and there condemned and distributed. By the ports of the enemy, the states-general understood those of the captors, for they say “of the aforesaid enemy,” thereby implying that it was not sufficient that the ships had been carried into another port, either of a friend or of an ally in the war. It appears to me that the Zealanders had the law, and the states-general had power on their side.*

Ships therefore become the property of the enemy, which have been taken by them, and carried into their ports. But what if they have not been yet carried thither, and should have remained some time in the port of a friend or ally, or navigated in company with the capturing ship? Certainly, if we consider the laws of our country, and the authority of publicists, it can hardly be said, that the length of time that ships have been captured, or the place into which they have been carried, though ever so safe, can transfer the property, unless they have been carried into port. Hence jurists simply say, that every thing which is retaken before it is carried into the enemy’s ports, is entitled to postliminy, although it may have been taken for several months, and although it may have remained in the ports of a common friend, and that it does not vest in the enemy, unless he has carried it into his own ports. The word postliminy is very improperly used here, because those who know what postliminy is, know also, that it does not take place except in regard to those things which had before become the property of the enemy. They should have said, that before prizes were carried into port, they did not become the property of the enemy, but remained the property of the former owner, and that therefore when recaptured they returned to him, and did not go to the recaptor.

It will not be unprofitable to consider what laws have been made on this subject in this country, taking them in their chronological order. There are some who think from the edict of the states of Holland, of the 4th of March 1600, that there existed a right in favour of former owners to claim their captured property, wherever they might find it, even though it had been carried into the enemy's ports. This is correct as far as the edict goes, but it speaks only of those vessels, which the states of Holland considered as having been condemned in violation of the laws of war, as I have said before; (c. 2.) therefore the edict does not apply to the present question. If the ships have been lawfully taken, carried into port and condemned, every claim must cease; and if they sail afterwards, there remains nothing but a right to recapture, and whoever retakes them will be their full and complete owner. But it is important to know, before the carrying of the ship into port and her subsequent condemnation, what right belongs to the former owner, and what to the recaptor? If we know what belongs to the one, we know at the same time that the remainder belongs to the other.

The oldest law that I know of on this subject, is the edict of the states-general of the 4th of July 1625, by which it is enacted, that if a vessel be retaken within twenty-four hours, one eighth goes to the private recaptors; if within forty-eight hours, one fifth; if afterwards, one third. This law the same states-general on the 22d of July 1625, applied to ships of war, recapturing private vessels. There followed afterwards another law also enacted by the states-general, of the 11th of March 1632, by which, without any distinction of time, private recaptors were entitled to two thirds of their recapture. But afterwards, on the 1st of September 1643, the states-general altered this disposition, for by the fifty-eighth section of their edict of that date, if a ship be recovered within twenty-four hours, the recaptor is to have one eighth; if within forty-eight hours, one fifth, and if afterwards, one third, as in former edicts, which, I think, were made on the 4th and 22d of July 1625. Afterwards they returned to two thirds, without any distinction of time with regard to privateers, agreeably to the edict of the year 1632. The 16th section of the edict of the states-general of the 8th of February 1645, gave two thirds to the recaptors, and added that the value of the vessel and cargo should be amicably estimated between the owner and the recaptor, otherwise that the admiralty should decree on the amount of salvage. They again changed their minds on the 19th of April 1659, for by a decree of that date, they gave to the recaptors, whether of public or private ships, but one ninth part of the vessel and cargo retaken, thus again abolishing every distinction of time. This decree, however, was never published, but I have found it among the acts of the states-general, and it is mentioned somewhere else. At last, the states-general, saving, as they say, the ancient laws as to ships of war (what ancient laws they meant I cannot say, as they have so varied) did on the 13th of April 1677, decree as to private recaptors as follows, to wit: that they should have by way of salvage, one fifth of the ship and goods retaken, if the same had not yet been forty-eight hours in the possession of the enemy; if forty-eight hours and less than ninety-six hours, then one third; if more than ninety-six hours, one half.

The king of England and the states-general were pleased to establish between them the same distinction and division of time, and the same rates of salvage, by the treaty above mentioned of the 22d of October 1689, in case a privateer of one nation should retake the ships or goods of a subject of the other party, but if the recapture should be made by a ship of war, the recaptor was to have only one eighth, without any distinction of time.

Now, why so much variety? why these distinctions of time and those greater and lesser shares in proportion thereof? Whence again, if the distinction of time must be had, so much diversity in the proportion of the salvage? Why also, rejecting all distinction of time, is now so large a proportion as two thirds and now so small a one as one ninth allowed to the recaptor? Certainly it is difficult to give a reason for things that have been established without any reason, and here, if any where, it will be proper to refer to the law *non omnium—the reader knows the rest. The public tranquillity of nations however, and the repose of our own subjects, require that something certain should be established upon rational principles. The whole depends upon this question: when do we consider that captured ships and goods vest absolutely in the enemy? The law indeed has decided that they so vest by a true and complete occupation. But the variety of cases and circumstances does not always permit us to know, whether there is actually a firm possession, that is to say, such a one as the captor may retain and defend. What the enemy has taken on the high seas, at a great distance from his territory, he may lose, and often loses by recapture. If he carries what he has taken into his own ports and territory, no one can doubt that it has then become his absolute property. I would say the same if he had carried it into the port of a neutral or of an ally, but if this, as I said above, cannot be admitted, † I must grant, that whatever is taken at sea, is to be carried into the captor's own port or fleet, and that it cannot be until then considered as fully his.

What then, if it be recaptured before that time? Then the former owner will have a right to claim his property, as the property has neither vested in the captor nor in the recaptor; I say the former owner, because there has been an intermediate possession of some kind. But shall the owner claim his property from the recaptor, without paying him any salvage or reward for the recapture? without any remuneration for his labour and expense in and about the said recapture? this, equity, the supreme law of nations, will not permit. It requires that a salvage, premium, reward, something, in short, by whatsoever name it may be called, should be given. The recaptor has saved the ship and goods, which otherwise would have been lost to the owner, and why should he have exposed himself to danger without any hope of reward? why should he have fought for the property of another as if it were his own? why should he have employed his arms and his men to no purpose whatever? He has beneficially managed the business of the owner, and he is entitled for his labour and expenses to the action negotiorum gestorum.* I do not know of any other action in the Roman law proper for the recaptor; if the thing is to be decided by the rules of the Roman jurisprudence, for this action is the only proper one when a reward is sued for, either for work and labour done or for money laid out. But upon what law or principle it has been thought proper to give to the recaptor a part of the thing retaken, I do not myself understand; much less do I understand how that proportion can be greater or less according to the quantity of time that the thing taken has been in the hands of the enemy. What have 24, 48 or 96 hours to do here? The greater or lesser duration of the enemy's possession, when the thing taken has not been carried into a place of safety, cannot, in my opinion, give a greater or a less right.†

Wherefore, if the subject is to be considered according to the rules of reason, every distinction of time is to be abolished, and in lieu thereof is to be the proportioned value of the recaptor's labour and expenses, taking into consideration the danger that he has been exposed to, and the value of the things saved. From all these considerations taken together, impartial men are to settle and determine what reward he is entitled to. Nor should the allowance be dealt with a sparing, but with a liberal hand, in order to encourage the industry of recaptors. For, is it to be of no consequence whether the recapture has been made with great or little trouble or labour? whether the recaptor has fought bravely? whether he has expended a great deal? whether the things saved are of great or of little value? If it should be observed that the valuation of such things is so uncertain that it might occasion a great deal of litigation, I answer, that as the matter stands, there will not be less controversy, and that there have often been great contestations about the value of a ship and goods, and what ought to be deducted from it,* before the true value thereof has been determined.

* This action in the civil law is analogous to our general assumpsit founded on an implied contract, for work and labour done and money laid out and expended. T.

But afterwards, if you still chuse to give a part of the thing saved, give it; not, indeed, in proportion to the time that the prize has been in the possession of the enemy, but to the labour employed upon it, as is usual in other cases of salvage. Thus the Rhodian law has allowed a reward to those who have saved property from shipwreck, varying according to the degree of labour, as is said by Harmenopulus, Πρωχ. l. 2. tit. 11. § 18. agreeably to which I interpret the reasonable salvage which Mary of Burgundy allowed to the salvors of shipwrecked property, by her law made for Holland and Zealand, on the 14th of November 1476. A proportion of the thing saved from shipwreck was also allowed by the edict which Philip II. on the 15th of May 1574 issued in the name of William of Orange, which has been often since reenacted, and lately, on the 2d of April 1676; but the salvor is allowed there a greater proportion than is therein expressed, if he has been at a greater labour and expense. I conceive that the states of Holland had a view to this, when on the 22d of July 1677, they decreed a reasonable salvage to those who should take up timbers floating down the rivers without any guard; and deliver them up to the company of ship-builders at Dordrecht. Those laws do not distinguish, how long the things shipwrecked, and the timbers found drifting may have been floating at the mercy of the sea, rivers and wind, as there is no reason for that distinction, but left it to the arbitration of impartial men, to determine the amount of the reward for the labour and expenses. Nor do I think that any other rule should be followed, with respect to ships and goods retaken from the enemy.

Indeed, in the book called Il Consolato del Mare, the point is determined exactly as I have said; for there the recaptor is ordered to restore the vessel and cargo to the former owner, saving however, a salvage, which, in order to be just, is to be liquidated in proportion to the labour and expense employed in and about the recapture,* without making any distinction about the time that the vessel and cargo have been in the possession of the enemy. It is very properly added in the same book, that this restitution only takes place when the ship has not yet been carried into a place of safety, but that if it has been so carried, the property having thus clearly vested in the enemy, if the ship and goods are afterwards retaken, they belong entirely to the recaptor.† Which agrees perfectly with the doctrine that I have contended for in this chapter. I wish that all the principles which are contained in that sarrago of nautical laws were equally correct; but every thing that is there is not so sound.

CHAPTER VI.

Of the Possession of Immovables taken in War.

WE must now consider, for the subject is worthy of it, how far extends the possession of immovables acquired in war, and the property arising out of such possession. *Grotius simply says, that every kind of possession is not sufficient, but that it must be a firm possession, which he explains thus: "as if a country is so provided with permanent fortifications, that the adverse party cannot enter it openly without first making himself master of them by force." What then if the fortified town is taken; shall the country be considered as taken also, and for how long? Grotius decides absolutely nothing about this, and yet he often proposes this question when he speaks of the capture and occupation of places. An example will make the thing more clear. The French had taken Casal and Turin in Piedmont; a truce was afterwards made, during which it was agreed that each party should keep what he had taken on the principle of uti possidetis. A question was made about the territory and villages which owed services and duties to the cities which were held by the French.

There were lawyers who decided that question against the French, on the ground that the law of nations requires actual possession, acquired by natural means, and that the part occupied does not draw along with it the part not occupied. Therefore they were of opinion that the obligation of those inhabitants did not enure to the use of the French, as the citizens themselves submitted to their dominion against their will. It is thus contended by Petrinus Bellus,† with whom I do not know whether Zouch agrees.‡ But I think Bellus was mistaken: he was certainly so in the case of a truce like the present, because the general words uti possidetis embrace an implied as well as an actual possession. That implied possession consisted in the performing and receiving services and duties, which were usually rendered only to the master; but what actual possession is will be seen from what I am about to say.

* De Jure B. ac P. l. 3. c. 6. § 4.—† De re militari, part 5. t. 3. n. 7.—

Reason, therefore, is to point out to us, what may be properly called a possession of immovables, taken in war, which is that the whole is occupied and possessed, if such has been the intention of the captor; and thus Paul defines it in l. 3. § 1. ff. de Acquir. vel amitt. rer. poss. That this is not a principle merely of civil law, but also of natural law, the thing itself, and custom which is an excellent teacher, abundantly demonstrate. Possession extends to every thing that is occupied, and what is occupied is placed within our power by the law of nature; but even that is considered as occupied, which is not touched on all sides with our hands or feet, if the occupant so chuses, or the nature of the case requires it, as is the case with lands. On another principle it would not be easy to say what is possessed or occupied, for if every thing is to be touched, it is not even sufficient to touch the surface of the land; it will be not only necessary to walk round, but to dig into every field.

But although it be true, that a part being taken, the whole is taken, when the taking is made with that view or intent, yet it will not otherwise obtain, than if no other person possesses another part of the thing in question. For if another possesses a part of the same whole, he would by the same reason possess the whole. This cannot be said with propriety, for as Paulus very truly says in D. l. 3. § 5. two persons cannot at the same time possess the whole of the same thing, because the ownership of one would exclude the ownership of the other. If then one is in possession of a thing, and another takes a part of it which the other does not corporally occupy, he has taken nothing but what he has occupied by natural means, nor can the thing be possessed pro ratâ, in proportion to the parts which each actually occupies, because the possession of the first occupant is paramount, and cannot be excluded by another, which is only similar, each of them having the same force and effect as the other. And the latter occupant has done away what is called the legal possession of the other in that part which he detains, for no other reason than because he possesses it by natural means; for the natural possession has taken away the legal one. It is the same thing that Celsus says in l. 18. § 4. ff. Eod. “Si cum magna vi ingressus est exercitus, eam tantum modo partem quam intraverit obtinet.” If an army has entered a territory with great force, it has possession only of that part of the country which it has entered upon.” When he says, with great force, he means that there was a resistance made, and that there were those who defended by force the possession of the first owners. An army, therefore, does not further occupy a country than it has compelled the opposite army to recede. Perhaps Paulus is to be thus understood, in D. l. 3. § 1. when he says that a part being taken with intent to take the whole, the whole is occupied, but to a certain extent only, usque ad terminum; which I take to mean, so far as to that part which another possesses, whether it be a neighbour on an adjoining land, or some other person on the very land which is contended for.

Hence it is not difficult to discern what may be considered as properly occupied in an occupied country. The metropolitan law of itself has nothing to do with this case, for it is a municipal law which the sovereign may establish wherever he pleases. If so, it is easily understood that if from the occupation of a strong place, dominion is exercised over the whole country, yet by that occupation, the victor is not considered in possession of those cities, walled towns and fortresses which the sovereign still detains, but all these things are to be judged of by the fact itself of occupation and possession.

According to this principle we say, that if a part of a country be occupied, the whole is considered as occupied, if the vanquished party has retained no other part of it; but if he has, then nothing is occupied, but what the victor has taken by force from the vanquished, and is actually in possession of. But in regard to several distinct countries under the dominion of the same prince, it may be asked, whether the same distinction can apply, which is used with regard to contiguous private estates? If Titius is the owner of three-contiguous plantations, A, B and C, and Gaius occupies part of the plantation A, he will be considered as occupying the whole of it, but not the plantations B and C. For when we possess an estate, our possession goes as far as its extent, or its boundaries, but no farther; fundo enim possesso, ad terminum quidem, sed ad terminum duntaxat, neque ultra possidemus. D. 1. 3. § 1. ff. de Acquir. vel amitt. rer. poss. He who has entered on part of the plantation A, is not supposed to have entered upon it with any other intent than to possess himself of the whole of that of which he has occupied a part, but he is not considered as having thought in the least of the manor B or the manor C. When we occupy a part of a whole which is distinguished from all other things, that distinction marks the boundaries of our possession, whether it be a house, a piece of land, a store or warehouse, or any other thing which comes under the denomination of immovable property.

But in my opinion there is another principle as to immovables which are occupied by right of conquest.

The intention of the conqueror is not merely to invade one district, but the whole of the hostile empire, and to make his own all the countries belonging to it. Nor is there here any boundary, but that part of the country which the vanquished still retains. If there is nothing that the conqueror cannot possess, if he pleases, what hinders him from proceeding on and actually possessing the whole? If no one district is retained by the vanquished, the occupation of a single one by the conqueror, nay, of the metropolis alone, will give him possession of the whole empire. Here we must acknowledge the truth of what the ambassador of the emperor Justinian said to Chosroes, king of Persia, according to Menander Protector, Hist. Byzant. tom. 1. p. 143. Ὁ γὰρ δεσπότης ἡγεμονικῆ, πῶς ἔκ ἐχει τὸ ὑποβιβατικόν; Shall not he, who is the master of him who commands, also be the master of what is subject to him? But if the conquered party still retains something, it will not be considered as a conquest of the whole of his dominions that his metropolis has been taken and is occupied by force of arms.

Those princes therefore have justly been laughed at, who because they had taken Rome or Constantinople arrogated to themselves the whole Roman empire, while other princes occupied several large parts of it. Of this kind was the arrogance of Belisarius, as related to us by Procopius, de Bello Vandal. l. 2. c. 4.; for he, after Justinian had taken Carthage and her king Gelimer, boasted publicly, that every thing belonged to him which Gelimer possessed in Sicily. Here he was altogether wrong, for the right which he had over Carthage and the person of her king, could not transfer to him the possession of what was in Sicily. Sicily defended itself by its own force, and by taking the king, the whole of his dominions was not taken. Actual occupation is necessary, or a cession, if it be so agreed by the treaty of peace.

Let us now see what the states-general have decreed upon this subject. When by the 3d section of the truce between the archduke of Austria and the states-general of the 9th of April 1609, it was agreed that each should continue to possess what he was in possession of at the time of the truce, and the archduke had posted up his edicts in the territory of Kuyck, which he occupied, the states-general on the 20th of August 1609 decreed, that that territory belonged to them, because they possessed the town of Grave, to which it was subject, and prohibited all others from exercising jurisdiction therein. When also the states-general had taken some fortresses in the Overmaze, and the Spaniards had nevertheless prohibited the inhabitants from submitting themselves to the jurisdiction of the council of Brabant, sitting at the Hague, the states, by way of retort, opposed that interdiction by their edict of the 8th of March 1634. Again, when Boisleduc belonged to the states-general, and the Spaniards made great disturbances respecting the territory thereof, the states obviated them by various edicts, viz. of the 20th of January and 3d of August 1630, 13th of May 1631, 20th of June 1634, 2d of February and 2d of December 1636, and again on the 24th of December 1642, in which edicts, of the 8th of March 1634, and 2d of February 1636, is also recited the edict of the king of Spain of the 10th of July 1628, in which that sovereign asserts, at great length, that the territory subject to a town follows the conquest of the town itself. The states availed themselves of the same principle, and very properly too, because those are considered as being in possession of a territory, who command there at their pleasure. But if there is in that territory a fortress not yet occupied, so far as that fortress commands the territory, the possession and dominion of the occupier of the remaining part of the country does not take place.

If the principles which I have contended for are correct, as indeed they appear to me, the council of Brabant, which legislates at the Hague for those parts of Brabant which the states have taken by the right of war, has justly enacted by its edict of the 26th of October 1629, that the investiture of the fiefs situate in the territory of Boisleduc, was to be asked of them, and not of the council of Brabant, sitting at Brussels. And it also appears, that the king of Spain had no right to issue, as he did, a contrary edict on the 15th of November 1629, as Aitzema relates in detail.* For, by the capture of Boisleduc, the whole adjacent territory belonged to the states-general, and therefore they were the lords of the fiefs situated there; as the conquered vassal owes fealty and services to the conqueror, not to the conquered prince.

There is still less doubt, that if a province be ceded, all its parts are ceded likewise. On this subject there is extant an edict of the states-general, of the 22d of December 1610, concerning Twent, a district of the province of Over Yssel.

CHAPTER VII.

Of the Confiscation of the Enemy's Actions and Credits.

IF there are treaties between princes about taking away their goods within a certain time in case war shall take place, several of which treaties I have above mentioned, c. 2.; it is true that they may remove their goods and effects as well as their actions and credits. But if there are no such treaties, or if the goods and actions are not taken away within a limited time, it is asked, what is the law in that case? And surely, such being the state of war, that enemies are on every legal principle proscribed and despoiled of every thing, it stands to reason that every thing belonging to the enemy, which is found in the hostile country, changes its owner and belongs to the fisk.* It is besides customary in almost every declaration of war to proclaim that the goods of enemies, as well those found among us, as those taken in war, shall be confiscated.

There are also now extant on this subject separate acts of state, whether preceded or not by a declaration of war. The prince of Orange, on the 25th of August 1572, inserted in the form of government which he then made for Holland, "that the goods of all those who acted publicly as his enemies, should be immediately registered by the magistrate of the place where they were found, and their rents and profits should be taken for the benefit of the commonwealth." I understand this to apply to real estates, which it is usual to register, that the rents and profits in time of war may go to the public. If we follow the strict law of war, even immovables may be sold, and their proceeds be lodged in the public treasury, as is done with movables; but throughout almost all Europe, immovables are only registered, that the treasury may receive during the war their rents and profits.

* As we make use of the words fiscal, confiscate, confiscation, why should we not adopt in America the word fisk, from the Latin fiscus, which is the root of all those derivatives?

At the termination of the war, the immovables themselves are by treaty restored to their former owners.

On the 2d of April 1599, the states-general again issued an edict with regard to all kinds of enemy's property, wherever found, which is in these words: "We declare lawful prize all persons and goods situate or being under the jurisdiction of the king of Spain, wherever the same may be taken." There exists also a letter from the states-general to the court of Holland dated the 25th of November 1672, by which they are simply ordered to detain and confiscate the goods of those who reside among the enemies, on which there issued an edict of the court of Holland of the same day, declaring that the goods could not be restored to their owners after the date thereof. I am not now inquiring whether this be agreeable to the treaty made in the year 1662, between the states-general and France. But as estates of inheritance are principally to be included under the denomination of goods, (bona)* it is clear that an enemy cannot acquire such an estate situate in our country, even though it came to him by succession or by will. Agreeably to this principle, when in the year 1695, a person died intestate in Holland, whose next of kin and heirs at law were in France, I remember that the inheritance was confiscated.

As the edicts which I have recited speak in general terms, they are to be taken to apply to all kinds of goods, whether corporeal or incorporeal. Of incorporeal goods, however, such as actions and credits, I see that doubts exist, and that the states-general themselves have doubted,† nay, and have some-

* At the civil law the word bona includes every kind of property, real, personal and mixed, but chiefly, as our author says, applies to real estates, chattels being generally distinguished by the words effects, movables, &c. The English civilians translate the word bona by goods, which we employ here in the same sense, though very different from that of the common law. T.

† Not only doubts have been entertained on this subject in the United States and Great Britain, but the two governments by the treaty which was made between them in 1794 have expressly recognised the opposite principle. By the tenth article of that treaty, it is stipulated "that neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys which they may have in the public funds or in the public times acted in contradiction to the principle. When the king of France and the bishops of Cologne and Munster, in the year 1673, confiscated even actions,* and gave orders to call in what their subjects owed to the citizens of the United Provinces, the states-general, by their edict of the 6th of July 1673, reprobated it, and decreed that payment could not be made but to the true creditor, and that they would not ratify such an exaction, whether made by force or by consent. But in fact it appears that by the common law† actions may be confiscated, for the same reason that corporeal goods may. Actions and credits are by the law of nations not less under our dominion than other goods; why, therefore, might we pursue these and not those by the law of war? and if there is no ground here for a rational distinction, reason alone supports the principle of the common law. But examples and authorities are not wanting in support of it.

It appears from Polybius, Excerpt. Legat. c. 35. n. 4., that it was agreed between the Romans and Antiochus, that actions, as well as every thing else which had been confiscated during the war, should be restored. Therefore it follows, that actions had been confiscated on both sides. That the kings of France and Spain also exercised this right towards each other, appears by the twenty-second article of the treaty of peace made between them, on the 17th of September 1678, for by that article it is stipulated that credits which have been actually confiscated shall not be restored. And the king of Denmark, having declared war against the Swedes, did on the 9th of March 1676 issue an edict ordering that the goods of Swedes within the Da- or private banks, shall ever in any event of war or national differences be sequestered or confiscated, it being unjust and impolitic that debts and engagements contracted and made by individuals, having confidence in each other and in their respective governments, should ever be destroyed or impaired by national authority on account of national differences and discontents.”

T.

* Here we again use the technical language of the civil law. The common law term is things, or choses in action.

T.

† The civil law and the law of nations are very frequently styled “the common law” (jus commune) by writers on the continent of Europe. They are, in fact, in many respects, the common law of the civilized world. T.

nish empire, and all the debts due to Swedes, should be brought within six weeks into the public treasury, there to be confiscated, under a penalty of double the value and discretionary punishment against those who should not obey. The king of Denmark had decreed something similar against the English in 1667, as is related by Aitzema.*

Nor does it appear that the Dutch have always been averse to that doctrine from the edict of the 18th of July 1536, from that of Philip II. against the French of the 27th of March 1556, and that of the states of Holland of the 29th of January 1591. There is also an edict which the prince of Orange and the court of Holland issued on the 7th of December 1577, under the assumed name of Philip II. king of Spain, by which they ordered the confiscation of all the movable and immovable property, and of all the actions and credits, not only of those who had gone over to Don John of Austria, but of all their enemies. The states-general also, on the 4th of June 1584, declared those of Bruges and Vrye, who had gone over to the Spaniards, to be their enemies, and ordered all their goods, actions and credits, public as well as private, to be confiscated. And afterwards, when those of Venloo had also gone over to the Spaniards, the earl of Leicester, by his edict of the 9th of July 1586, declared them guilty of the crime of high treason, and ordered all their goods, movable and immovable, and all their actions and credits, to be confiscated. Nor must it be believed that these things were decreed concerning those of Bruges, Vrye, and Venloo, merely because they were not so much enemies as they were traitors, as they had previously bound themselves by the confederation of Utrecht; for I must observe, that the penalties of the edict of the 4th of June 1584 are expressly applied to all who hold themselves to be our adversaries, in whatever manner it may be, precisely as in the abovementioned edict of the 7th of December 1577, traitors and enemies are classed together, as to that particular purpose.

Under this head are also to be noted the decrees of the states-general of the 2d, and of the states of Holland of the 29th of

* Aitz. b. 47.

October 1590, in both of which the following sentence is contained: "That those who come into these provinces out of the enemy's territory, although provided with proper passports, shall not be qualified to bring any personal or real action, either in the petitory or in the possessory, but shall be dismissed from court, in order that hostility against the enemies, and the confiscation of their goods, rights and actions, may subsist in their fullest extent." By these decrees they are not permitted to bring even personal actions, and the reason publicly given for it clearly shews that they cannot do it, because not only the goods of enemies but their actions are liable to confiscation. And when once the king of France had ordered the goods of Dutch subjects to be seized, the states of Holland, on the 26th of April 1657, ordered the same thing with regard to the goods of French subjects, and prohibited any body from paying to them, on pain of being compelled to pay the amount a second time, for the indemnity of the Dutch subjects who had suffered by the seizure of their goods in France, and of paying moreover half the amount of the debt by way of punishment, and they ordered the goods and credits of Frenchmen to be brought under a penalty to certain officers appointed in each town for that purpose. Wherefore, if the subject of a prince who has confiscated the credits of his enemies, should pay to his government what he owed to the enemy, it has been very properly held that he is discharged.

These things, however, do not take place when war is carried on with so much mildness that commerce is permitted on both sides: for there cannot be any commerce without contracts, contracts without actions, actions without courts of justice, nor courts of justice without parties to litigate before them. Who will sell and carry goods to an enemy without the hope of recovering the price of them? and what hope can there be of recovering that price, if one cannot judicially compel payment from his enemy purchaser? Although, therefore, an enemy has no persona standi in judicio,* as it is simply expressed in the decrees of the 2d and 29th of October 1590, and although it has been thus held and adjudged in this country in various instances, yet the case of commerce is properly excepted, that is to say, when there is a mutual liberty of trade; for if there is not, actions, though arising out of commerce, may justly be confiscated. But is the case of commerce to be so distinguished from all other cases, that in this we grant, and in others we refuse to the enemy the persona standi in judicio? It has undoubtedly been so adjudged, and if the distinction is proper here, it must also obtain as to the confiscation of actions. But if the enemy be once permitted to bring actions, it is difficult to distinguish from what causes they arise, nor have I been able to observe, that this distinction has ever been carried into practice.

Moreover, if you do not permit your enemy to bring actions, neither can you with justice suffer them to be brought against your enemy, if perchance he should tarry within your territory, and thus the decree of our supreme senate, of the 18th of September 1590, confirming the sentence of the inferior judge and of the court of Holland is unjust, to wit, that an enemy, who had come with a safe conduct into this country, might be arrested and held to bail in a civil action. For it is manifestly unjust to hinder an enemy from bringing actions, (as he is plainly forbidden by the said decrees of the 2d and 29th of October 1590,) and not to allow him the same privilege. Whatever right one arrogates to himself by the law of war, he must also allow to his enemy.

What I have said about the legality of confiscating actions, obtains only in case the prince has really made his subjects pay what they owed to the subjects of his enemies. If he has exacted it, they have lawfully paid, if not, when the peace takes place, the former right of the creditor revives, because the occupation which is had by war consists more in fact than in law. Therefore credits not exacted are in some manner suspended during the war, but at the peace they return to their former owners by a kind of postliminy. Upon this principle it has been agreed among almost all nations, that actions which have been confiscated during the war, and have been called in by the sovereign, are considered at the peace as lost, and are for ever extinct; but if they have not been exacted they revive and return to the real creditors. It was thus agreed by the fifth article of the treaty of peace between Frederick III. king of Denmark and Charles II. king of England, of the 31st of July 1667, the thirty-seventh article of the treaty of peace between the kings of Spain and England, of the 21st of September 1667, and the twenty-second article of the treaty of peace between the kings of France and Spain of the 17th of September 1678, which twenty-second article I have mentioned above in this chapter, in order to establish what is proved by the said 5th and 37th articles, that actions have not less than other goods of the enemy been confiscated in time of war, and have often been exacted.*

Let it not, however, be supposed, that it is only true of actions that they are not condemned ipso jure; for other things also, belonging to the enemy, may be concealed and escape condemnation. So that it has been very properly held that those things which we had in the enemy's country before the war began, and which during the war have been concealed, and therefore not condemned, if they are afterwards retaken by our countrymen, do not become the property of the recaptors, but return to the former owners.

* Vattel, though he acknowledges the legality of confiscating in war the enemy's actions and credits, yet tells us that a more liberal practice has generally prevailed in modern times. "Mais aujourd'hui, l'avantage et la sûreté du commerce ont engagé tous les souverains de l'Europe à se relâcher de cette rigueur. But at this day, the advantage and security of commerce have induced all the sovereigns of Europe to relax from this severity." Vatt. Law of Nat. b. 3. c. 5. § 77. T

CHAPTER VIII.

Of Hostilities in a neutral Port or Territory.

WE only exercise the rights of war in our own territory, in the enemy's, or in a territory which belongs to no one. If we take the enemy in our own territory, and he has come to it without a safe conduct, there is nothing that prohibits our treating him in a hostile manner. To enter the territory of an enemy, and there to make captures, is permitted by the law of war. The same may lawfully be done on the high seas, as being the territory of no one. But he who commits hostilities on the territory of a friend to both parties, makes war upon the sovereign who governs there, and who by his laws coerces every violence, by whomsoever it may be committed. Therefore the Carthaginians, though with a superior naval force, did not dare to attack the Romans in a port of the king of Numidia, as Grotius (after *Livy) relates in l. 3., De Jur. Bell. ac Pac. c. 4. § 8. n. 2., and Zouch, De Jur. Fec. part 2. § 9. Q. 7., transcribes it out of Grotius. Zouch there states some contrary arguments, but Grotius had already mentioned and refuted them.

But as all the publicists (without any exception that I know of) prohibit the use of force in the dominions of another, it deserves to be considered, whether the usage of nations and the edicts of our princes† and states‡ are conformable to this opinion, and whether on this subject the right to pursue ought to be distinguished from the right to attack? To begin with the princes. Philip II. king of Spain,§ in the nautical laws which he gave to the Belgians on the last day of October 1563, (tit. 1. § 27.) ordered, on pain of death, that no violence should be done on the sea, by reason of war or for any other cause, on his subjects or allies, or on foreigners, within sight from land or from a port. He therefore understood the dominion of the continent to be extended as far as the sight can reach from the shore, and there are authors who are of that opinion. But I have shewn this to be too vague, in the second chapter of my Dissertation de Dominio Maris, being of opinion that the dominion of land ends where the power of arms terminates. And that the states-general and the states of Holland were of the same opinion, I think I have sufficiently proved by the two decrees made concerning the salute at sea, quoted in the said chapter 2, and also in chapter 4.*

Certainly it is by no means lawful to attack or take an enemy in the port of a neutral who is in amity with both parties. If it be done, it is the duty of the neutral state to cause the thing taken to be restored, either at its own expense or at the expense of the injured party. That it should be done at the expense of the latter has been agreed by the twenty-second article of the treaty of peace between the commonwealth of England and the states-general of the 5th of April 1654, the twenty-first article of the treaty of peace between the king of England and the states-general of the 14th of September 1662 and again by the 29th article of the treaty of peace between the same powers of the 31st of July 1667. The same is stipulated by the forty-eighth article of the commercial treaty between the king of France and the states-general of the 27th April 1662, but there is no mention made therein of the expenses being to be borne by the injured party, which appears to me to be very unjust, as it is the duty of the sovereign of the territory to revenge the injury done to himself; for it is an injury done to him to violate a port which is equally open to all his friends. And what if he who committed the violence goes away immediately? Is the individual, whose vessel, perhaps, has been taken, to make war at his own expense? Therefore the mention of the expense is properly omitted in the thirty-fifth article of the treaty of commerce which was made between the same powers on the 10th of August 1678, in the fortieth article of the treaty of commerce between the same of the 20th of September 1697, and again in the thirty-ninth article of the treaty of commerce between the same of the 11th of April 1713, for later treaties are generally without any further examination copied from the former ones, as we have seen just now to have been the case with the English. Those articles of treaties between France and the states-general only stipulate that the sovereign of the port, bay or river in which a prize shall be made from a friend, shall use his utmost endeavours that the captured property be fairly and justly restored. If it be the duty of the sovereign to use his utmost endeavours to effect that purpose, it follows that he must do it at his own expense, nay, by going to war, if other means are not sufficient. Such is the law which is observed among all nations, and there is no other reason for it than that it is not lawful to commit violence within the territory of another, and that ports, bays,* and rivers, are also within the territory of the sovereign of the country. Thus the grand duke of Tuscany, in the year 1695, caused the French, who had taken near the port of Leghorn a ship of the powers allied against France, who were friends to the grand duke, and carried her into that port, to restore her immediately; for, as I have said, the sea which is near to the ports of a sovereign is a part of his territory. These principles may easily be applied to the following cases:

In the year 1639, while admiral van Tromp was blockading in the Downs the fleet of the Spaniards, who were in amity with England, the states-general, on the 21st and 30th of September 1639, issued decrees by which they ordered him “to destroy the Spanish fleet, without paying any regard to the harbours, roads, or bays of the kingdoms where it might be found, even though the English should make resistance,” and the admiral immediately carried that order into execution, and was praised and approved for it by the states-general, as is commemorated by Aitzema in various places.*

This can hardly be defended, neither can the conduct of the English, who, on the 12th of August 1665, took some ships of our East India company, in the port of Bergen, in Norway,† not without great indignation in the Danes, who repelled the English with all their might. In order, however, that the case of van Tromp may not be considered as too outrageous, two things are to be attended to; the one, that the English, in the year 1627, had taken out of Holland a ship of the king of France, then at war with England, but in amity with the states-general;‡ the other, that the Spaniards themselves, in the year 1631, were charged with having committed hostilities against the ships of the states-general, in the ports of the king of Denmark, then a common friend to both, as I read in Aitzema.§ Otherwise, if nothing can be charged that gives just cause to exercise the right of retaliation,¶ it is manifestly unjust to attack an enemy in the port of a common friend. And thus the states-general decreed in the year

* Aitz. l. 19.—† Ibid. l. 45, 6, 7.—‡ Ibid. l. 7. 9. 19. 20.—§ Ibid. l. 11.

¶ But see page 33, where our author justly contends that retaliation is only to be exercised directly against the enemy, and never through the injury of a friend.

1623,* on a memorial of the English ambassador. The ships of the states-general had committed hostilities against the ships of England, in the river Elbe, a neutral river. Great complaints were made on this subject, not only by the English, but by the Hamburghers, and various ambassadors of the Germanic empire.† As to the complaints of the English, they could easily have been silenced, by reminding them of what had happened the preceding year at Bergen, in Norway, but it was not so with the others, for this aggression was solely founded on the right of retaliation. Nor can it be doubted that the French acted very unjustly, when in the year 1693 they set fire to certain Dutch ships in the port of Lisbon, at that time neutral, which the king of Portugal would not either permit to be fired at nor to be taken away. This fact I assert from my own memory.

It might be more doubted, whether it is lawful to pursue in the heat of battle an enemy met with on the high seas, into a neutral river, station, port or bay? The weight of argument is in favour of permitting it, on taking certain precautions which I shall enumerate by and by. Such certainly was the opinion of the states-general in the year 1623,‡ when they answered to the English ambassador that it was not lawful to commit violence in a neutral port, “with this understanding, however, that it was hoped his majesty would not take it amiss, if any Dunkirkers were met with on the high seas, that they might be pursued even along the king’s coasts and into the king’s ports.” The same opinion of the states-general appears expressed in their decree of the 10th of October 1652,§ but so, however, as is very properly added in it, that the castles of neutrals be spared, even though violence should be committed from them, and that the enemies also be spared, if they should have already entered the neutral ports. Both of these exceptions are right, for it is better to suffer within the dominions of another than to act, and if we act, we are to be very careful that the force used against our enemy shall not hurt our friend. If therefore two fleets fight in the open sea, I do not pretend that the conqueror may not justly pursue the conquered fleet, even though it should be driven to the territory of a neutral. But I approve the direction of the states-general in their decree of the 10th of October 1652, to abstain from violence in the port itself, because violence could not be done there without danger to the neutral. On this principle it is not lawful to begin an attack on the sea near the land, within shot of the cannon from the fortresses, but it is lawful to continue an attack already commenced, and pursue the enemy into a jurisdictional sea even close to the land, or into a river, bay or creek, provided we spare the fortresses, though they should assist the enemy, and provided there be no kind of danger to our friends.

From facts which afterwards took place, the states-general appear to have approved even thus much; for when in the year 1654 a Dutch commander met an English vessel on the high seas and pursued her flying into the port of Leghorn, where he took her at the moment she was coming to anchor, the grand duke of Tuscany complained of it to the states-general, but we read that he complained in vain.* He, however, afterwards took satisfaction, by condemning the Dutch vessel that had made the pursuit and occasioned the capture of the English one.† Again, when the Ostenders had fired at a Dutch ship which was pursuing an English vessel into the port of Ostend, the states-general‡ complained of it to the court of Spain as of an illegal act, because the Dutch ship had not fired at the English vessel in the port of Ostend. But this reason is not good, except to aggravate the injury done to the Ostenders, for it is not of any consequence what kind of hostility you commit on your enemy, but whether you attack him in a hostile manner. Upon the whole, it appears that the states-general approved both the pursuits that I have mentioned, because the force was begun before, and was only continued.

* Aitz. l. 4. —† Ibid. —‡ Aitz. l. 45.

The law is the same at land as it is on the sea; so that there as well as here we may justly pursue an enemy flying from a recent fight into the dominion of another. I think the states-general acted in conformity with this opinion when they decreed, in 1653,* that the Lorrain soldiers, who had ravaged the Dutch dominions, might be pursued even into the dominions of the king of Spain; but this cannot be defended, unless it is a fresh pursuit from a conflict or devastation immediately preceding. Otherwise, we may not any more make use of the territory than of the port of a friend, to destroy our enemy. And the states-general very properly, at the request of the king of France, who was at peace with the king of Spain, forbade upon pain of death, that any one should commit hostilities against the Spaniards, in the dominions of the king of France.†

The states-general also justly complained of the Spaniards, when in the year 1666, those of Munster passed through their territory to commit depredations in the dominions of the states-general, and they demanded of Spain an indemnity for the damage which they had suffered from them. This demand‡ might have been just, if the Spaniards had willingly and knowingly permitted those of Munster to pass through their territory, in order to go and commit depredations; but it does not any where appear that the case was so. If they knew it, it was their duty to prevent any hostility being committed against their friends from their territory.

Therefore I do not approve of the conduct of those of Wolffenbittel, who, in the year 1700, being, as is said, neutral, permitted the Saxons to commit depredations from their territory on those of Lunenbourg, and in like manner permitted the allies of the Lunenburgers to kill the Saxons. At the utmost it is lawful, after a recent fight, to pursue the flying enemy into another's dominion; for the same reason that Philip II. king of Spain, by the seventy-sixth section of his criminal edict of 1570, gave permission to pursue a criminal immediately and flagrante delicto into a territory not our own. But it is one thing to begin a hostility, and another to pursue the force while the thing is yet warm. For it is not a new doctrine, that an act lawfully begun may be continued where it would not have been lawful to give it a beginning. In short, it is not lawful to begin force within the territory of a neutral, but if begun out of that territory, it is lawful to continue it there in the heat of action, dùm fervet opus.

Thus it seems that this distinction may be made and contended for without absurdity. Yet I have never seen it mentioned, either in the writings of the publicists or among any of the European nations, the Dutch only excepted. Nevertheless, reason both persuades and commands it, and it is made use of in other analogous cases. If we attend to it, we shall without difficulty decide on the following fact: A Spanish ship pursued by a French ship (the two nations being at war) fled into Torbay, was run aground there, and concealed her cordage, tackle, sails, &c. in the houses of the inhabitants. The French mariners went on shore and took those articles from the houses they were in, and carried them on board of their own ship. Now was it lawful for the French to attack the houses of the English, and to take away the things that were protected there? It could not be done without injury to the English; therefore the king of England in the year 1668 very properly ordered every thing to be restored, and recommended the prosecution of the national injury to his ambassador in France, as we are told by Aitzema.* The same author relates† other complaints of the English for the violation of their ports by the French, and informs us of the damages which they paid therefor, but I shall not particularise those cases; the reader will judge of them by attending to the distinction which I have just now suggested, if he is as satisfied with it as I am.

CHAPTER IX.

Of Neutrality.

I CALL neutrals (*non hostes) those who take part with neither of the belligerent powers, and who are not bound to either by any alliance. If they are so bound, they are no longer neutrals, but allies. Grotius has called them middle men, (medii) l. 3. De J. B. ac P. c. 9. Of these it is asked what is lawful for them to do or not to do between two belligerent parties? Every thing, perhaps it will be said, that it was lawful for them to do or to omit doing when they were all at peace, for the state of war does not seem to extend farther than to those who are at war with each other. Does reason require, will you say, that the enemies of our friends should be considered as our own enemies? If not, why shall not our friends carry to their friends, though they be our enemies, those things which they were in the habit of carrying to them before? nay, arms, men, and every thing else? It militates, indeed, against our own advantage, but we are not considering what is advantageous, but what is reasonable. The injury suffered is alone the cause of the war, and it is evident that that injury has no effect beyond the person of him who has suffered it, except, that if he is a prince, it extends also to all his subjects, but not to those who are not subject to his dominion. Whence it must follow, that my friend's enemy is not my enemy, but that the friendship between us subsists precisely as it did before the war.

* It is remarkable that there are no words in the Latin language which precisely answer to the English expressions, neutral, neutrality; for neutralis, neutralitas, which are used by some modern writers, are barbarisms, not to be met with in any classical author. These make use of the words amici, medii, pacati, which are very inadequate to express what we understand by neutrals, and they have no substantive whatever (that we know of) for neutrality. We shall not here inquire into the cause of this deficiency. Such an inquiry would carry us too far, and does not comport with the object of this work

We find that the counsellors of the states-general adopted this doctrine, when on the 3d of March 1640 the states issued an edict on their report, declaring that agreeably to ancient custom and to the law of neutrality, it was lawful for neutrals to fight for us or for our enemies as they might think proper. And when the Spaniards, on the 30th of March 1639, issued an edict declaring that if any of the people of Liege had enlisted in the service of the states-general, they should return within one month, having first taken an oath that they would no more fight against Spain or the house of Austria, otherwise, every pardon would be denied to them, a similar edict was made in retaliation on the 3d of March 1640, in the name of the states-general, of which I remember that it was to be in force as long as that of Spain, which in the said edict of the 3d of March 1640 was represented as an innovation, entirely devoid of reason, and stigmatized in these words: “an unreasonable edict—such novelty and unreasonableness—so long as the Spaniards shall continue in force their unreasonable edict,” &c. Such also was the opinion of certain Dutch citizens, expressed in the states of Holland, on the 26th of February 1684, when they urged the sending of auxiliary troops to the Spaniards, to be employed against the French, which they said could be done without injury to the peace then subsisting with France, salva pace et amicitia cum Francis.

But certainly this opinion is not to be approved, if we speak of those who are simply neutrals. It is their duty to be every way careful not to intermeddle at all with the war, and not to do more or less justice to one party than to the other. It is the same thing that we read in Livy, b. 35. c. 48. Bello se non interponant, let them not intermeddle with the war, that is to say, in causa belli, as to what relates to the war, let them not prefer one party to the other, and this is the only proper conduct for neutrals. I do not know whether what Grotius says, De J. B. ac P. c. 7. § 3., will be satisfactory: “The duty of those, says he, who abstain from the war, is to do nothing by which he who supports an unjust cause shall be made stronger, or whereby the motions of him who carries on a just war may be impeded.” If I judge rightly, a neutral has nothing at all to do with the justice or injustice of the war, it is not for him to sit as judge between his friends who are at war with each other, and to give or deny more or less to the one or to the other as he thinks that their cause is more or less just or unjust. If I am a neutral, I cannot be useful to one that I may hurt the other, alteri non possum prodesse, ut alteri noceam.

But, will you say, may not I send to each of them whatever I may think proper? It is what friendship requires. If one power makes use of what I shall send him for the destruction of the other, what is that to me? But you must not adopt such an opinion: you must rather believe, that the enemies of our friends are to be considered in two points of view; either as our friends; or as the enemies of our friends. If we consider them only as our friends, then it is proper to assist them with advice, soldiers, arms, and all that they may want to carry on the war. But inasmuch as they are the enemies of our friends, it is not lawful for us to do so, because we thus would prefer, in causâ belli, one of them to the other; and this the equality of friendship, which is first to be attended to, forbids. It is more important to preserve friendship with both, than by favoring one of them in causâ belli, thus tacitly to renounce the friendship of the other.

And indeed, what I have just now said is not only conformable to reason, but to the usage admitted by almost all nations. For although it be lawful for us to carry on trade with the enemies of our friends, usage has so ordered it, as I shall shew more at large in the next chapter, that we should not assist either of them with those things by which the war against our friends may be carried on. It is therefore unlawful to carry to either party those things which are necessary in war, such as cannon, arms, and what is most essentially useful, soldiers; nay, soldiers are positively excepted by the treaties of various nations, and sometimes also materials for building ships, which might be used against our friends, have been excepted. Provisions likewise are often excepted, when the enemies are besieged by our friends, or are otherwise pressed by famine.* The law has very properly forbidden our supplying the enemy with any of those things; for it would be, as it were, making war against our friends. Therefore if we consider the belligerents merely as our friends, we may lawfully carry on trade with them, and carry to them any kind of merchandize, but if we consider them as the enemies of our friends, those merchandizes must be excepted, by means of which they might injure those friends; and this reason is stronger than the former, for in whatever manner we may assist one against the other, we do interfere in the war, which is not consistent with the duties of neutrality. From these reasons may be seen which had the most justice on its side, the edict of the Spaniards of the 30th of March 1639, or that of the states-general of the 3d of March 1640, of both of which I have spoken above.

Thus I have shortly laid down what has appeared to me to be the duty of those powers which are not bound by any alliance, but are in a state of perfect neutrality.† These I have

* It was probably on the principle which this vague word otherwise seems to indicate, that the British government issued their provision order against France, or rather against neutrals, on the 8th of June, and signed their convention with Russia, on the 25th of March 1793. If such is the strict law of nations, we must again repeat what we have said in a former note, that it is very nearly allied to barbarism. T.

† There are two kinds of neutrality, which some writers distinguish by the words perfect and imperfect, and others by absolute and qualified. Absolute neutrality is when the neutral is bound to neither of the belligerents by a treaty, the execution of which may affect the other in case of war, otherwise, his neutrality is no longer absolute, but qualified. Thus if a neutral is bound by treaty to admit the prizes of one party into his ports and not those of the other. At the beginning of the war of 1793 the United States were neutrals between France and Great Britain, and so our government declared them to be by that proclamation which at the time excited so much sensation; our neutrality, however, was not absolute; it was qualified by the treaties made with France in 1778, which, independent of the mutual guaranties and eventual alliance, contained several articles that applied only to a time of war. Between a qualified neutrality and an alliance there are many shades, and it is often difficult to draw the line which separates the one from the other. Our author, however, seems here to confound them together, and to consider every qualified neutrality as an alliance. T.

simply called neutrals, in order to distinguish them from allies and confederates. If the doctrine which I have contended for be correct, I cannot agree to the principle which I have seen advanced by many writers upon public law, to wit, that I may and ought to support and assist that one of my friends whose cause appears to me the best and the most just, not only by supplying him with military stores, but by going openly to war for him, if the case require it. This is not correct, for it is never right to interfere with the business of others. When neither of my friends has entered into any engagement with me, why shall princes, who are independent, and masters of their own actions, stand or fall by my judgment? It does not belong to me to avenge the injuries of every sovereign; it is sufficient if I avenge my own, and those of my allies. If, however, the injury done to another is such, that I may fear for myself, and there be no other hope left, but of being the last devoured, it may perhaps be admitted, that I ought to assist my oppressed friend; for it cannot be otherwise than impious to make war upon a friend, while he continues to be called such, and unless your friendship with him has been first dissolved.

As to allies and confederates, the thing is quite different. If two sovereigns with whom I am allied, are at war with other nations, I shall administer to both the succours which I am bound to give by treaty; but if they are at war with each other, shall I assist both, or only one of them, and which of them in preference? On this question the interpreters of the law are at variance with each other, not less so than nations themselves. Gentilis, De Jure Belli, l. 3. c. 18. relates various opinions, and adds his own; Grotius, De Jure Bell. ac P. l. 2. c. 15. § 13., and after him Zouch, De Jure Fec. part 2. § 4. Q. 28., lay down various distinctions. Certainly auxiliary troops shall not be sent to each ally, even though they be due by treaty; for it would be most absurd to send my soldiers to both, that they may fight against each other. Those who hire out their soldiers are often in that predicament, but this does not belong to the present disquisition. As to myself, I think that whether my allies are at war with a foreign nation, or with each other, the only thing to be distinguished, is which of the two has the most just cause of going to war. If they are both engaged in a just war with foreigners, I shall render to both that aid which I am bound by treaty to give: if only one of them, I shall deny it to the other. If two of my allies are at war with each other, I shall perform the obligation of my treaty with respect to him who has the best cause, of which I shall be myself the judge, as you will hear by and by. And thus we may easily do without the opinions and distinctions of others.

But what if I have promised succours to my ally and confederate, and he is at war with my friend? I think that promises are to be performed, and may be performed, because allies constitute, as it were, one society to be defended by mutual assistance. But here I must distinguish, whether my ally has received an injury, or has inflicted one; if he has received it, I shall perform my promise: if on the contrary he is the aggressor, I shall not perform it, because I am not bound to assist my ally in an unjust cause. But whether the cause be just or unjust, is to be determined by the judgment of the party bound.*

I wish indeed, that what I have said of the justice and injustice of a cause, was clearly and roundly expressed in treaties between nations; but those which I have seen simply express, that the one ally shall furnish to the other, when attacked, so many naval or land forces, and no more is said. But when the treaties say when attacked, there can be no other interpretation, but that succours are to be given to that ally, who is unjustly made war upon; to him who is attacked by, not to him who attacks the enemy. However, I do not find that expression, when attacked, sufficiently clear. For what if he who is attacked should have done an injury to the other, and thus have afforded him a cause of war? shall I send succours to that unjust ally? No, I shall not. It should be said then, that to him who is unjustly attacked, succours should be sent, as likewise to him who has not afforded a cause of hostility, and whose fault or injury has not begun the war. Although, however, it be not openly expressed, that exception is always tacitly understood in treaties, which Grotius has proved, De Jure B. ac P. l. 2. c. 15. § 13. n. 1., and I do not know any who differ from him.*

He who has promised succours, and he alone, as I have just now said, judges also of the justice of the cause, and whether the casus fœderis, as is commonly said, has taken place or not. For the contracting parties are not in the habit of submitting that to the decision of arbitrators; which indeed would be very right, as treaties might not then be made sport of, as they now are. Otherwise, who is there, who will not interpret treaties as he may think will suit best his own interest? who will not evade them by a false interpretation?† The ancient Greeks and Romans, even in public matters, often left the justice or injustice of their cause to be determined by others, as is proved by many examples quoted by Grotius, l. 2. c. 25. § 4.; and it was right to do so. But this part of the law of nations is now disused, and hence hardly any thing now-a-days remains of treaties but an empty name.

This is only applicable to treaties made before the breaking out of the war, by which supplies have been promised; for in my opinion, after the beginning of the war, succours cannot be properly promised or sent to either friend, and he who will promise or send them to one, will violate his neutrality with the other.

As to those states which are tributary to us or under our protection, they constitute a kind of intermediate description of states; for, from the very nature of protection, they are not considered as enemies, nor also as subjects, as they belong to another prince. They may therefore assist their sovereign, though he is our enemy, but not with arms and men, wherewith he may make war upon us. Therefore the counsellors of the states-general, on the 17th of March 1641, and afterwards on the 18th of July 1746, very properly decreed, that those of the territories of Luxemburg and Namur, who were under the protection of the states, and generally, on the 14th of August 1645, that no neutral under our protection should fight for the king of Spain, even though he had fought for him before, and that no one, who had quitted the service should be recalled into it. The same counsellors, on the 23d of February 1636, issued an edict, that none of those who were under our protection should assist the enemy's camps with horses, wagons, or ships: and very properly, because, by acting thus, they would have afforded assistance to the enemy. The law is different, as to those things which are carried to an enemy, for other purposes than for war; and therefore the states-general, although they had before generally prohibited the exportation of corn, decreed however, on the 23d of May 1631, that those who were under our protection might carry their corn to the Spaniards or to the United Dutch, as they might think proper. For a neutral may lawfully carry corn to an enemy, except in case of a siege or famine.

The states-general, by the third section of their edict of the 26th of September, 1590, prohibited the treating of neutrals, their vessels and goods, in a hostile manner, even though found in the enemy's territory, provided they were bound to the United Provinces, or thence to other places. Yet there are those who have written, as if the states-general on the 15th of December 1672, had decreed by a general law, that even neutral vessels, when coming from enemy's ports might be lawfully condemned. But no credit is to be given to those wretched scribblers; for the fact is that the edict of the 15th of December 1672, was a special one, and made merely by way of retaliation for the condemnation of the Hamburg ship, as I have before shewn in chapter 5.

CHAPTER X.

Of Contraband.

IT was formerly a capital crime at Rome to sell arms to the barbarians;* that is to say, it was capital in the subjects of the empire, for whom alone the Romans made laws. And it is now certainly so in every country, for a subject to carry arms to an enemy. Nay, by the first section of the edict of the states-general against England, of the 5th of December 1652, not only every subject, but a foreigner who should carry any kind of merchandize to the English, is to be considered as an enemy. Which by the second section of the edict of the states-general against the Portuguese, of the 31st of December 1657, is justly restricted to contraband goods. By the 1st section of the edict of the states-general of the 14th of August 1672, and 11th of April 1673, against the English and French, and the 1st section of the edict of the 19th of March 1665, against the English, he is punished as an enemy to the state, who carries to the host nation any warlike ammunition, provisions, materials for the building of ships, or any other prohibited merchandize. It is the same with a foreigner who carries those goods to the enemy from this country.

But the states-general as well as every other prince may make what laws they please with respect to their subjects; not so with respect to foreigners. Hence it is properly asked what is lawful for us by the law of nations to carry to the enemies of our friends, or, what is the same thing, what may our friends lawfully carry to our enemies? Whatever is not lawful to be carried, if the friend take it, he may lawfully confiscate, and by that confiscation alone, the whole penalty of the law is satisfied. Grotius, de Jure B. ac P. l. 3. c. 1. § 5. n. 1, 2, 3., being engaged in the consideration of this subject, distinguishes between those things that are useful for the purposes of war, those which are not so, and those which may be used indiscriminately in war and in peace. The first he prohibits neutrals from carrying to our enemies, the second he permits, the third he sometimes prohibits, and sometimes permits. If we adopt the principles which we have contended for in the preceding chapter, we cannot be much at a loss with regard to the first and second class of articles. As to the third class, Grotius distinguishes, and permits the intercepting of things of promiscuous use, but in case of necessity only, when otherwise we cannot protect our own, and then under the obligation of restitution. I shall only ask here who is to be the judge of that necessity, for it is very easy to allege it as a pretext? Shall it be I, who have taken the articles? Such, I think, is his opinion. But all laws prohibit my sitting as judge in my own cause, unless so far as custom, the prince of tyrants, admits, when treaties between sovereigns are to be interpreted. Nor have I been able to observe, that this distinction of Grotius is supported by the usage of nations; it rather confirms what he afterwards says, that it is not lawful to carry to besieged places, things of promiscuous use, because it would be assisting one party to the destruction of the other, as will be more fully explained in the next chapter. As to what he adds, in conclusion, that a distinction is to be made between the justice and injustice of the war, I think I have sufficiently proved in the preceding chapter, that it may be proper for *allies in a certain case, but never for neutrals.

* Our author in the chapter to which he refers seems to consider qualified neutrals as allies, and indeed, as we have said, the line is often difficult to be drawn between a qualified neutrality and an alliance: but why should states be the judges of the justice of the war in one case more than in the other, and what has that to do with their engagements? Will they not in every case, as our author himself has before observed, decide for their own advantage? See notes p. 71, 72.

The law of nations on this subject is not to be drawn from any other source than reason and usage. Reason commands me to be equally friendly to two of my friends, who are enemies to each other, and hence it follows that I am not to prefer either in war. Usage is pointed out by the constant and as it were perpetual custom which sovereigns have been in of making treaties and laws upon this subject, for they have often made such regulations by treaties to be carried into effect in case of war, and by laws enacted after the war begun. I have said by, as it were, a perpetual custom; because one or perhaps two treaties, which vary from the general usage, do not alter the law of nations. It is agreed amongst almost all nations, that it is not lawful for a friend to carry arms to an enemy, or other things which come under the denomination of contraband goods; nevertheless, by the 10th section of the treaty of peace of Westminster, made in the year 1654, between the English and Portuguese, it was stipulated that it should be lawful for the English to carry those things to the enemies of the Portuguese, as is observed by Zentgravius, De Orig. Verit. & Oblig. Jur. Gent. art. 7. § 8. p. m. 296, 297. And the Dutch obtained the same privilege of the Portuguese by the 12th article of the treaty of peace between them of the 6th of August 1661. Otherwise the rule which is proved by an almost perpetual succession of treaties, is, that neutrals cannot carry contraband goods to enemies, and that if they do it and are taken in the act, the goods are forfeited; but with the exception of these, they may freely trade with either party, and carry any thing to them with impunity.

According to these principles it was free to the Dutch, by the 3d article of the marine treaty between Spain and the states-general of the 17th of December 1650, section 4, to trade with the French in any kind of merchandize, in the same manner that they could have done before the war between France and Spain; so however, that they should not carry from the Spanish dominions to the French, things that might be employed against Spain; but by section 5, the Dutch are prohibited from carrying contraband goods to the other enemies of Spain, and by the 6th section those goods that are contraband are enumerated.

Again, by the 2d article of the abovementioned edict of the states-general against the English, of the 5th of December 1652, neutrals are prohibited from carrying to the English any ammunition of war, or any materials, serving to the equipment of vessels. Provision is also made against carrying contraband goods, by the 2d section of the edicts of 1665, 1672, and 1673, which I have already spoken of; there, after enumerating various species of contraband articles it is added, "and all other articles manufactured and prepared for warlike use." Nearly the same thing is found in the 27th and 28th articles of the commercial treaty between France and the states-general of the 27th of April, 1662; in the 3d article of the marine treaty between Charles II. king of England and the states-general of the 1st of December 1674; the 3d article of the treaty of commerce between the king of Sweden and the states-general of the 26th of November 1675; the 15th article of the marine treaty between the same powers of the 12th of October 1679; the 15th article of the treaty of commerce between France and the states-general of August 1671; the 11th section of the edict of the states-general de contrabandis, of the 28th of July 1705, and in several other treaties between different nations, some of which are enumerated by Zentgravius, l. 7. § 8.

From these I understand generally, that contraband articles are such as are proper for war, and that it is of no consequence whether or not they are of any use out of war. Very few are the implements of war, which are not also of some use out of war. We wear swords for the decoration of our persons, we make use of the sword for the punishment of criminals; nay, we even make use of gunpowder for our amusement and to express public joy. And yet there is not any doubt but that these come under the denomination of contraband articles.

Of those things which are of promiscuous use, it would be endless to dispute, and it would be so if we were to follow Grotius's opinion about necessity and the various distinctions which he brings forward. If we examine the treaties made between the different nations, which we have already mentioned, and also those which exist elsewhere, it will be found, that every thing is called contraband, which is of use to belligerent nations in making war; whether they be warlike instruments or materials by themselves fit to be used in war. For what the states-general on the 6th of May 1667, decreed against the Swedes, that even materials, not of themselves fit for war, but which might easily be adapted to warlike use, were to be considered as contraband, was founded on a special reason, to wit, the right of retaliation, as the states themselves express it in the said decree.

And hence you will judge whether the materials themselves out of which contraband goods are formed are themselves contraband? Zouch, de Jure Fec. part, 2. § 8. Q. 8., appears, if any thing, rather inclined to this opinion. For my part I am not, because reason and precedents incline me to the contrary. If all materials are prohibited out of which something may be made which is fit for war, the catalogue of contraband goods will be immense, for there is hardly any kind of material, out of which something at least, fit for war, may not be fabricated. The interdiction of these amounts to a total prohibition of commerce, and might as well be so expressed and understood. And the 4th article of the said treaty of the 1st of December 1674; the 4th of the said treaty of the 26th of November 1675, and the 16th article of the said treaty of the 12th of October 1679, which prohibit neutrals from carrying arms to enemies, permit the carrying of iron, brass, metals, materials for building ships, and in short every thing which is not already prepared for warlike use.

Sometimes, however, it happens, that materials for building ships are prohibited, if the enemy is in great need of them, and cannot well carry on the war without them. When the states-general by the 2d section of their edict against the Portuguese, of the 31st of December 1657, prohibited the supplying the Portuguese with those things which by the general usage of nations are considered as contraband of war, they specially added by the 3d section of the same edict, that as they feared nothing from the Portuguese except by sea, no one should carry to them even materials for building ships; thus openly distinguishing those materials from contraband articles, and prohibiting them only for a special reason expressly set forth. For the same reason, materials for ship building, are joined with instruments of war, in the 2d section of the edict against the English of the 5th of December 1652, and in the edict of the states-general against the French of the 9th of March 1689. But these are exceptions which confirm the general rule.

It is asked whether scabbards are to be considered as contraband? Petrinus Bellus, de Re Militari, part 9. n. 26, 27, 28., says that it has been so decided by the military judges, though he himself does not approve of that decision. Zouch, De Jure Fec. part 2. § 8. Q. 2., satisfied with giving out of Bellus, the arguments on both sides, decides nothing, according to his custom. For my part, I approve of the decision of the military judges, and I am opposed to the opinion of Bellus, because scabbards, although of promiscuous use, are however, instruments prepared for war. Without scabbards, swords cannot be used, and without swords there can be no war. Nay, holsters, saddles and belts are numbered among articles of contraband in the said 2d, 3d and 5th articles of the said edicts and treaties which I have above mentioned. Holsters, as to their use, do not differ in any thing from scabbards: the latter are cases for swords and the others for pistols. Certainly these might be excused, if they were in very small quantity; and the said third article of the treaty of the 26th of November 1675,* has also this exception: "unless these instruments should be in so small a quantity, that it might be inferred from thence that they were not designed for the use of war."

What shall we say of sword hilts? The same, I think, as of scabbards, for they are instruments fit and prepared for war, and are also included in the list of contraband goods, in some of the edicts and treaties which I have before cited. Of saltpetre, more doubt might be entertained, because it is not of itself an article fit to be used in war; and yet saltpetre is contained in all the lists of contraband articles which I have mentioned, for out of saltpetre gunpowder is made, which is now the principal article used in war. Nay, I have observed that saltpetre is sometimes mentioned with the addition of gunpowder and sometimes without. Where gunpowder is omitted, saltpetre is mentioned in lieu of it; when both are mentioned, they are considered as synonymous words, unless saltpetre, on account of its important use in war, should have been excepted by nations out of those articles which of themselves are not fit for war.

Of tobacco, Zouch informs us, De Jure Fec. part 2. § 8. Q. 12. that there was a great contention between the English and the Spaniards, and that the latter considered it as contraband,* to the great indignation of the English, who went so far as to issue reprisals against them. What became afterwards of that controversy I know not; this I know, that I cannot concur in opinion with the Spaniards, because the fact is, that tobacco cannot be of any use in destroying the enemy. Nay, by the said 3d, 4th, 15th and 16th articles† it is lawful to carry tobacco to an enemy, for by the same articles, it is lawful to carry to the enemies of our friends all things which in the condition they are in are not fit for war, and tobacco is nominally included among lawful goods, by the 4th article of the said treaty of the 1st of December 1674.

It is clear by the l. 22. § 1. ff. de Jure Fisc. that if a pledge is forfeited, the jus pignoris is not thereby extinguished. Hence if neutrals had shipped contraband goods to our enemies and bound them for the freight, if the goods are taken in the course of the voyage, and condemned as contraband, the Dutch lawyers have given it as their opinion that the captain is entitled to his freight, as though the whole voyage had been performed. And it is related that it was thus decided by the court of admiralty of North Holland, on the 6th of May 1665, and of Friesland, on the 12th of July in the same year, on the principles that res transit cum suo onere, that the risk yields to creditors, (fiscus cedit creditoribus‡) and others of the like kind. But the court of admiralty of Amsterdam decided differently on the 9th of July 1666; they refused to allow freight to the captured, without prejudice, however, to his rights against whomsoever else it might concern. And this is very correct; for the freight is not due unless the voyage is performed, and the enemy has lawfully prohibited its being performed. Then contraband goods are condemned, either ex delicto, when the captain and mariners are no less in fault than the owners of the goods, or ex re, for the very carriage of the goods themselves; for although we cannot prohibit neutrals from trading with our enemies, yet we may prohibit their assisting them in the war to our destruction. Therefore what is condemned, is condemned without regard to any man, and is to be considered as if it had perished by the act of God, whereby the jus pignoris is extinguished.* I am not, however, astonished at those lawyers having been of opinion, that the master of the vessel has a lien for the freight on contraband goods that are condemned, I rather wonder that they have not allowed it in preference to the owners of the merchandize; for they have jus in re, a right of property, which is the strongest of all.†

* The reason alleged was that tobacco might be used, as well as salt, to preserve provisions from corruption. Zouch, ubi supra. T.

† See p. 77. 78.

‡ In this country, and in England, the opposite maxim prevails. The sovereign is entitled to a priority of payment, et creditores cedunt fisco. T.

It is denied that the subject of an ally or confederate, trading with a common enemy, may be punished by us, or his property condemned; because it is said that every one is bound only to obey the laws of his own sovereign, and therefore that an ally can have no control over him. But reason, usage and public utility, are opposed to that decision. The reader may, if he pleases, turn to what Aitzema has written‡ upon that subject; for my part, I shall abstain from it. As I am now only treating of what contraband is, such a discussion cannot with propriety be introduced in this place.

* This doctrine is now adopted as to contraband goods, which are condemned ex delicto; but not as to enemy's goods, which are condemned only ex re. In the latter case, when the conduct of the captured is fair, freight is generally allowed. See post, c. 14 in note. T.

† There seems to be no real difference here, for the master can only claim as agent for the owners, to whom the freight belongs. T.

CHAPTER XI.

Of Trade with blockaded and besieged Places.

I HAVE said in a former chapter,* that by the usage of nations, and according to the principles of natural reason, it is not lawful to carry any thing to places that are blockaded or besieged. Grotius is of the same opinion; for he reprobates the carrying any thing to blockaded or besieged places, "if it should impede the execution of the belligerent's lawful designs; and if the carriers might have known of the siege or blockade; as in the case of a town actually invested or a port closely blockaded, and when a surrender or a peace is already expected to take place."† Indeed, it is sufficient that there be a siege or blockade to make it unlawful to carry any thing, whether contraband or not, to a place thus circumstanced; for those who are within may be compelled to surrender, not merely by the direct application of force, but also by the want of provisions and other necessaries. If, therefore, it should be lawful to carry to them what they are in need of, the belligerent might thereby be compelled to raise the siege or blockade, which would be doing him an injury, and therefore would be unjust. And because it cannot be known what articles the besieged may want, the law forbids in general terms carrying any thing to them; otherwise disputes and altercations would arise to which there would be no end.

Thus far my opinion coincides with that of Grotius, but I cannot agree with him when he requires an expectation of a surrender or a peace,* and when he says immediately afterwards that even under those circumstances, the carrier is only bound to an indemnity for the damage occasioned by his fault, and if no damage has been suffered, that he may only be compelled by the detention of his goods to give security that he will not do the like in future. I wish that Grotius had not laid down such principles, which are neither consonant to reason, nor to the sense of treaties. For on what principle am I to be the judge of the future surrender or peace? and if neither is expected, is it then lawful to carry any thing to the besieged? I think on the contrary, that during a siege, it is always unlawful. It is not acting a friendly part to ruin, or in any way impair, the cause of a friend, and if so, why shall he who carried supplies to my enemy not be bound farther than for the damage occasioned by his fault? Such conduct has always been considered as a capital crime in subjects, nay, in neutrals, when previously warned by a proclamation, and often without such warning. As they are generally private individuals, who, impelled by the thirst of gain, are in the habit of administering supplies to the besieged; suppose, for instance, that such a one has been the cause that a city has not been taken, I should hardly think in such a case that any individual could be rich enough to repair the damage thereby suffered. And if he should be intercepted on his way to the besieged town with

* Our author appears here to have mistaken the meaning of Grotius. That writer does not, in our opinion, require as a necessary ingredient in a strict blockade, that there should be an expectation of peace or of a surrender, but merely mentions that as an example, and by way of putting the strongest possible case. We have transcribed the passage in the original language, with a literal translation in the preceding note, in order that our readers may be enabled to judge for themselves of the correctness of this remark.

the supplies that he is carrying thither, shall we be content with taking and retaining the articles, and that merely until he gives security that he shall not commit the like in future? I cannot subscribe to this opinion; being taught by the usage of nations, that the least punishment in such a case is the forfeiture of the things taken; and that a corporal penalty at least, if not a capital one, is often inflicted on the offender.*

Let us now turn to some treaties on this subject. By the 9th article of the marine treaty between the king of Spain and the states-general, of the 17th of December 1650, it is simply agreed, "that it shall not be lawful to carry goods, even not contraband, to places blockaded and besieged." The same clause is contained in a variety of other treaties† ‡ all of which, however, merely stipulate that it is unlawful to carry any thing to besieged or blockaded places, without affixing any penalty to the offence. But, if the carrying of any thing to a besieged town or place is illicit, it follows that every thing which is carried thither is to be considered as contraband; for every thing which is carried from one place to another contrary to law and *treaties is contraband, and as such, is at least liable to forfeiture. Thus usage has established it, as will be more fully shewn in the sequel; it has also established that the offenders may be punished capitally, or with a milder punishment, according to the circumstances of the case.†

* This is a very severe doctrine, and which certainly is not conformable to the usage of nations at the present day; but it must be observed that our author, as well as Grotius, only meant to speak of a strict and actual siege or blockade, where a town is actually invested with troops, or a port closely blockaded by ships of war, portus clausus, as Grotius emphatically expresses it; for at the time when those great men wrote, no idea was entertained of that enormous system of universal blockade, by means of edicts and proclamations, the effects of which have desolated the world for the last twenty years.

‡ In our treaties with other nations, no other punishment is contemplated for a breach of blockade, than a confiscation of the ships and goods. In our treaty with Great Britain of the 19th of November 1794, art. 18, it is even stipulated that that punishment shall not be inflicted, except in the case of a vessel which shall, after being warned, attempt to enter a blockaded port. 2 Laws U. S. 484. A similar stipulation is contained in the 12th article of our convention with France, of the 30th of September 1800. 6 Laws U. S. Appendix xx.

Not only towns or cities, but camps likewise may be surrounded with troops and as it were besieged. In such a case it is not more lawful to carry any thing to them, than to invested cities. But if they are not besieged, I see no reason why neutrals may not lawfully carry thither any thing which may be lawfully carried to towns, ports and places so circumstanced, that is to say, every thing which is not actually contraband. And yet, the counsellors of the states-general, in the name of the states, issued an edict on the 9th of August 1622, by which they decreed, that all who should carry any thing to the Spanish camp before Bergen-op-Zoom, should be considered as enemies. The same counsellors, on the 2d of September 1624, and on the 21st of March 1636, decreed the same thing against those who should carry any thing to the Spanish camp.

Those edicts are undoubtedly too unjust to be defended, if the camp to which they apply is not besieged, and the things

* Goods prohibited by treaty between the sovereigns of the captors and the captured, though otherwise they might not be considered as contraband, are condemned ex delicto, and no freight is allowed upon them. The Neutralitat, 3 Rob. 240. Am. edit. T.

† At this day, however, the only penalty which is inflicted for trading with a blockaded port is the forfeiture of the property detected in the pursuit of such trade. It is true, that on the strict principles of the law of nations, those who knowingly trade with blockaded ports, may justly be considered and treated as enemies, and so Vattel lays it down in his Treatise on the Law of Nations, l. 3. c. 7. § 117. But, in the manner that war is now carried on, such treatment cannot extend farther than the confiscation of the property, and perhaps, the imprisonment of the neutral captains and crews, which has sometimes, though rarely, taken place, and can only be justified (if at all) in very flagrant cases. Vattel does not mention any specific punishment to be inflicted in cases of this kind, though he relates the story of Demetrius, who hanged the captain and pilot of a ship carrying provisions to Athens, which he was besieging. But precedents are not now to be drawn from such barbarous times. T are not carried through the neutral's territory. The two first, however, extended to the subjects of the United Netherlands, to neutrals, and to the subjects of those states who were under the protection of the Dutch. But, although every sovereign has a right to enact with respect to his own subjects, what laws he may think proper, and no one can find fault with him for so doing; yet as far as they apply to neutrals, and the subjects of countries under the protection of the states, those edicts cannot be supported unless they are restricted to contraband only. The third edict of the 21st March 1636, relates to neutrals who should carry provisions or implements of war to the Spanish fortresses; but that was done, as is expressly mentioned, by way of retaliation, because the Spaniards had treated as enemies those who had assisted the town of Maestricht with provisions and arms. Retaliation,* therefore, removes the hardship of the edict as to provisions, which otherwise neutrals may lawfully carry, if there be no treaty to the contrary; but it is otherwise with arms and military stores, even though they be carried to a place not besieged, and so far this edict is perfectly just. As to other things, whether they were or not lawfully prohibited by the edicts of the Spaniards or of the states-general, depends entirely upon the circumstance of the places being besieged or not.

* It is but seldom that we are disposed to controvert the principles laid down by this excellent author, but we must here again refer the reader to what he says himself in chapter 4: Retorsio non est nisi adversus eum, qui ipse damni quid dedit, ac deinde patitur, non verò adversus communem amicum. "Retaliation is only to be exercised on him who has inflicted the injury, and therefore justly suffers for it, but not on a common friend." See above, p. 33. How then can he maintain in the present instance, as well as in another (p. 61.) that an injury done to a neutral can be justified on the principle of retaliation upon the enemy? We would have supposed that national prejudice (as in both the above cases the Dutch were the authors of the injury to neutrals) had made him overlook the very principle on which he had set out in the beginning of his work, were it not that he applies it there against a similar act of his own government, and freely reproveth their conduct in several other instances. Whatever may have been his motive, we are compelled to say that he is here in direct contradiction with himself, and that on his own clear and luminous principle, his justification of the conduct of the Dutch in these two instances cannot be supported. T.

The same law which obtains with respect to towns that are really besieged, and by a parity of reasoning has been applied to camps, as being, as it were, besieged, applies also to enemy's ports, which are blockaded by ships of war, and therefore are considered as in a state of siege. There is on this subject a remarkable decree of the states-general, of the 26th of June 1630, made with the advice and opinion of the court of admiralty of Amsterdam, and of other courts of admiralty, nay, it is probable, with the advice also of some private lawyers.* At that time, the states were blockading with ships of war the maritime coast of Flanders; it was then made a question whether neutrals might carry on trade with the ports of that country, and upon that the states made the decree in question, which we shall here lay before our readers and accompany it with a few remarks.

The first article provided "that the ships and goods of neutrals which should be found going in or coming out of the enemy's ports in Flanders, or being so near thereto, as to shew beyond a doubt that they were endeavouring to run into them, should be confiscated, because their high mightinesses kept the said ports continually blockaded with their ships of war, in order to prevent any commerce between them and the enemy;† as had been the custom many years before, after the example of all other princes, who had claimed and enforced a similar right in like cases."

By the second article it was ordered that the ships and goods should be confiscated, "if from the charter-parties, or other documents on board, it should appear that the vessels were bound to the said Flemish ports, although they should be found at a distance from them, unless they, of their own accord, before coming in sight of or being chased by our country's ships, should repent their intention, while the thing was yet undone, and alter their course; in which case the matter should be decided according to conjectures and circumstances."

* Consil. Holland. vol. 5. Consil. 161.

† The Spaniards, whose king was at that time sovereign of the county of Flanders, and of the rest of the Catholic Netherlands. T.

The third article directs the confiscation of such ships with their cargoes, "as should come out of the said ports, not having been forced into them by stress of weather, although they should be taken at a distance from thence, unless they had after leaving the enemy's port performed a voyage to a port of their own country, or to some other neutral or free port, in which case they should not be condemned; but if in coming out of the said Flemish ports they should be pursued by our own ships, chased into another port, such as their own or that of their destination, and found on the high sea coming out of such port, in that case they might lawfully be captured and confiscated." There is also a fourth article, which I have recited and commented upon before,* and which I think it unnecessary to say any more upon. But the three first articles of this law appear to me to require some explanation.

As to the first article, inasmuch as it condemns vessels found actually going into or coming out of the enemy's ports, there is no reason for it, but that which is expressed in the edict itself. It goes however further, and confiscates those which shall be found so near to the enemy's ports as to shew beyond a doubt that they intend running into them. This is reasonable also; because if prohibited goods are found on the confines of the hostile territory, they are presumed to be carrying to the enemy, not only according to the most general opinion of the civilians,† but also according to the intent and meaning of the states-general, which is fully expressed in this law and in various other edicts,‡ unless, indeed, as is provided in all the said edicts, they should prove that they were driven in by stress of weather. The same exception is made in the second article of this decree.

But, not to leave the coast of Flanders, precisely the same thing was decreed on the same subject, in the infancy of our republic; for by the edicts of the earl of Leicester,* by which he prohibits as well to foreigners as to subjects all commerce with the Spaniards, and by the edict of the states of Holland, of the 27th July 1584, neutrals, trading with the Flemish ports, are punished with the confiscation of their ships and goods, and that edict expressly provides that those “who shall be found on the coast of Flanders, or near “to some of the prohibited ports, shall be adjudged to have contravened this ordinance, except in cases of extreme and well proved necessity.” The opinion of Cynus, who writes that they are, even in such a case, to be punished as going to the ports of the enemies, when they have so far advanced on their way that they cannot return, is therefore not admissible, although it has the approbation of Albericus Gentilis.†

† Zouch, De Jure Fec. p. 2. § 8. Q. 10. quotes a number of authorities to this point.

‡ Edicts against the English, of the 5th December 1652, and 19th of March 1665, § 4.—Against the English and French of the 14th of April 1672, and 11th of April 1673, § 4.

Thus much I have thought proper to observe on the first article of this law; the reasonableness of which applies equally to the second article; for those things which are taken near to besieged places, are not condemned for any other reason, than that an intention of trading with the enemy is tacitly collected from the internal evidence of the fact itself, and it amounts to the same thing, as if that intention had clearly appeared from the documents on board, and therefore there is no room for any doubt. But what is added about repentance, I find some difficulty to admit; if, however, there is sufficient proof of the alteration of the voyage, I should not be far from acceding to that opinion.

The third article properly distinguishes between vessels which are chased or compelled to take refuge and those who proceed voluntarily to the port of their destination. The latter are excused, when found coming out of that port, their voyage being considered as ended, and a new one begun, while the former are condemned, as being taken in the very act of violation of blockade. But on the subject of these, the edict speaks in the disjunctive, and says, “if they are chased into their own port OR the port of their destination,” so that there may be a doubt as to the sense of these words and the law which results from them. Certainly there can be no doubt, if the same thing is meant by their own port, and the port of their destination; But if an Englishman who was bound to a port of Denmark is driven into a port of England, and coming out of it, and prosecuting his voyage, should be taken before he reached the Danish port, it appears to me that he would be taken in the course and in the very act of the illicit voyage, and that it would be of no consequence, whether it was his own port, or not, which he had entered into, if the voyage which he was engaged in had not been completely finished. Therefore, as disjunctives are frequently to be construed as conjunctives, I understand these words "their own port," in the said article, to mean the port to which the vessel was bound, and where her voyage was to be ended.* I shall put a case, in order more fully to illustrate my meaning: Suppose that a vessel from Zierikzee† is taken by the Dunkirkers, who condemn and sell her, and she is purchased by a Scotchman. By the 4th article of the said decree which I have above recited at large‡ it is only lawful to capture and condemn her, if found coming out of an enemy's port before she had entered into her own or into some other free port, but not afterwards. This vessel now belonging to the Scotchman, and coming out of Dunkirk, is met with, but not taken. She runs into Tarmouth, where she was not bound to, and coming out of that port, is captured. It is asked whether she is to be considered as having entered into her own port within the meaning of the edict? I cannot say that she is, because she has not entered into the port to which she was bound. The states-general in a similar case, with the advice of the admiralty of Zealand, decreed on

* Edict of the 4th of April 1586—of the 4th of August same year, § 9.

* We cannot perceive how any difficulty can arise as to the construction of this part of the edict; since, whether the vessel was chased into the actual port of her destination or into any other port of her own country, she is equally to be condemned according to the letter of the law as it is given to us. So that the interpretation which our author contends for, appears to us to be not only unnecessary but dangerous, as it would make a merely constructive offence, of what the legislator expressly made a positive one. T.

‡ C. 4. p. 30.

the 27th of January 1631, that the vessel should be condemned, as being within the edict of the 26th June 1630.* † What is said, moreover, in this third article about a free port, is explained by the fourth; for that cannot be understood to be a free port, which is under the same king or government with another which is not considered as such. ‡

This decree of the 26th June 1630, was for some time not carried into execution, and in the mean while a free commercial intercourse in 1642 carried on with Flanders. During that period certain neutral vessels, trading thither were captured by our vessels, and carried into Zealand. The contraband goods, however, were alone detained and condemned, and all the remainder was acquitted and released. It has been asked by what law the contraband goods were condemned under those circumstances, and there are those who deny the legality of their condemnation.§ It is evident, however, that while those coasts were guarded in a lax or remiss manner, the law of blockade, by which all neutral goods going to or coming from a blockaded port may be lawfully captured, might also have been relaxed; but not so the general law of war,

* Aitz. l. 11.

† This decree appears to us to have been very correct, not because the vessel had gone into a port of her own country, different from that of her actual destination, which, if she had done voluntarily, would have been a sufficient excuse, but because she had run into the port of Yarmouth to avoid pursuit, and was captured coming from thence, in consequence of which she was clearly within the letter of the third article of the edict. 7.

‡ The 4th article provides, that ships coming out of enemy's ports shall be condemned, if they are taken before they shall have been into their own or other free ports. (See above, p. 50.) Our author impressed with the idea that the words their own in the 3d article, only meant the ports of their actual destination, and being embarrassed by the words or other free ports in the 4th article, which clearly point to the opposite construction, thinks to get rid of his embarrassment, by assuming that other free ports cannot mean ports of the same country, that is to say, of the country to which the neutral belongs; thus arguing in a circle to which his first mistake unavoidably led him. We are loth to controvert the opinions of so great a writer, in any case, particularly when he is construing a law of his own country; but in the present instance the mistake is so obvious that we could not avoid noticing it. U by which contraband goods, when carried to an enemy's port, even though not blockaded, are liable to confiscation.

But although, as I have observed, the rigour of this decree of the 26th June 1630, may be sufficiently justified, it may however, be relaxed, if it shall be thought proper, and it has in fact often been relaxed. When admiral Van Tromp, in the year 1645, blockaded the ports of Flanders, with the fleet of the states-general, and asked of them, what he should do with neutral vessels, they decreed on the 1st of July, that neutrals should by all means be prevented from entering the ports of Flanders, but that their goods, not being contraband, should not be condemned.* The states, on that occasion, deviated from the principles which their predecessors had adopted in 1630. But when men change, what is there to prevent opinions from changing likewise?

If the principles which I have contended for in this and the two preceding chapters are correct, it will be easy with their help, to decide on the difference which took place between the English on one side, and the Poles and other nations on the other, of which Zouch gives us a particular account.† ‡

* Aitz. l. 4. Ibid. l. 25.

† De Jure Fec. p. 2. § 8. Q. 7.

‡ The difference to which our author alludes, is related by Zouch, substantially as follows: Queen Elizabeth being at war with Spain, had prohibited neutrals from carrying on any trade with that country. The ambassador of the king of Poland, in the name of his master, complained of it to the queen herself, in terms rather indecorous, to which she replied with becoming dignity, and defended her conduct by alleging, that the kings of Poland and Sweden had acted in the same manner some time before in a similar circumstance. The fact was, however, that those sovereigns in the year 1572, being at war with the czar of Muscovy, had merely prohibited the intercourse of neutrals with the ports of Livonia, which they blockaded with their ships, and which was at that time the theatre of the war by land, so that if Zouch is correct in his statement, the two cases were not parallel. But Elizabeth at that time was flushed with her victory over the invincible armada of Spain, and thought that there were no bounds to her maritime power.

To the Hanse Towns, Selden informs us, that she gave as a reason for the same proceeding, of which they also complained, that their ships could not go to Spain without passing through the English seas, which they had no right to do without her permission. Indeed, that author tells us that the measure

Of the mixture of lawful with contraband goods.

IF a neutral carries at the same time, lawful and unlawful goods to the enemy, and the vessel should be taken, it is asked, "whether the vessel itself and the lawful goods that are on board are to be condemned on account of those which are unlawful?" The same may be asked, if from any other cause, lawful and unlawful goods are mixed together. This was one of the several questions which were proposed in the year 1631, by the admiralty of Amsterdam to the states-general, for the interpretation of their edict of the 1st of April 1622. But, although the states gave their answer to the other questions which were propounded to them at the same time, Aitzema informs us* that they kept this under advisement. And I do not find that any decision has been given upon it, either at that time, or at any time since; the states-general, however, on the 6th of May 1667, gave public orders to their courts of admiralty, that they should not condemn lawful goods, or even the ship, on account of illicit merchandize. Thus much and no more, we are told by Aitzema,† and the states-general express themselves in the same general terms, in their several edicts of the 11th September 1665.‡

was not merely intended by Elizabeth to distress her enemies, but also to assert her claim to the dominion of the seas (dominii maris causá.) From his relation, however, and that of other respectable writers, such as Thuanus and Camden, it would seem that the prohibition was not general, as Zouch represents it, but was restricted to warlike stores and provisions, which at that time were by many considered as contraband. See on this subject, Zouch, ubi supra.—Selden, Mare Claus. l. 2. c. 20.—Camden, Annal. sub anno 1597.—Thuan. Histor. l. 96.—*Marquard. But I am of opinion with the authors quoted by Zouch, in his treatise on the Law of Nations,* that there is a wide distinction to be made between the case where both the lawful and unlawful goods belong to the same owner, and that in which they are the property of different persons. If they belong to the same owner, then the whole may be lawfully condemned, as a just punishment for the offence; but on the contrary, if they are the property of different shippers, then the act of one of them ought not to affect the others. This distinction was very properly taken by the Dutch lawyers, on the 31st of July 1692.† The Digest‡ also affords a strong argument in favour of this opinion, where, speaking of the owner of the vessel, Paulus distinguishes whether he knew or not that unlawful goods had been laden on board; if he knew of it, as if it was done in his presence, the law in that case declares that the ship also is forfeited; if on the contrary it had been done in his absence, and therefore he did not know of it, then the vessel is to be restored to him because he is not in fault. Zouch,§ however, without making any distinction, relates a case from Petrinus Bellus, by which it would seem that lawful goods had been condemned on account of others which were illicit, but on referring to that author,¶ it appears, that in that particular case, both the lawful and unlawful goods belonged to the same owner, who knew of the fraud, and therefore was properly punished with the confiscation of both: But of this we shall speak more at large presently.

In the meanwhile we shall turn our attention to the treaties and laws of our country, which have been made upon the subject. By the treaty of navigation between Spain and the states-general, of the 4th of February 1648, and the 12th article of the marine treaty between the same powers of the 17th, 1650, it is simply agreed, "that it shall not be lawful for the subjects of either country to carry contraband goods to the enemy of the other, otherwise, that such goods shall be confiscated. The same stipulation is contained in the 24th and 36th articles of the treaty between France and the states-general of the 27th of April 1662, but without any particular provision as to goods not contraband. In like manner, the several edicts of the states-general against the English and against the English and *French after enumerating a long series of contraband articles, direct the confiscation of these, without saying any thing as to lawful goods which may be found with them.

But by the 7th article of the marine treaty between Charles II. of England and the states-general, a distinction is clearly made between lawful and contraband goods, and the latter, but not the former, are declared liable to confiscation; nay, if the unlawful goods are immediately delivered up to the captors, the ship is to be instantly released, with the remainder of the cargo, and suffered to proceed on her destined voyage. A similar provision is made in a variety of other treaties† in which they differ from the edicts above mentioned, which direct the ships to be sent into port for legal adjudication, in all cases where contraband goods are found on board. By the 7th article of the treaty of commerce between the king of Sweden and the states-general of the 26th of November 1675, it is only stipulated that contraband goods shall be confiscated, but not the ship or lawful merchandize. No provision is made, as in the other treaties, for the immediate release of the vessel and of the innocent part of the cargo.‡

‡ In the treaties of the United States with other nations, the most liberal principle has been adopted in respect to the seizure of vessels having contraband goods on board going to the enemy. By the 17th article of our treaty with Great Britain of the 19th November 1794, it was stipulated

Such are the rules laid down by our own laws and treaties, and if we are to infer from them what the law of nations is, it will follow as a principle, that ships and lawful goods are never to be condemned on account of contraband merchandize carried on board of the same vessel. But it is not from thence that the law of nations is to be deduced. Reason, as we have said before, is the supreme law of nations, and she does not permit that we should understand these things altogether generally and without distinction. As to the vessel, I think that it ought to be distinguished, whether she belongs to the captain himself or to others. If to the captain, I should here again distinguish, whether he knew (as is most frequently the case) that contraband goods had been shipped on board of her, or whether he was ignorant of it; as if the mariners, in his absence, had concealed such goods on board. If he knew of it, he is himself guilty of the fraud, because he hired his ship for an unlawful purpose, and she ought therefore to be confiscated; but it is otherwise, if he did not know it, because in that case, the fraud cannot be laid to his charge. Such is the doctrine laid down by Paulus,* and it is evidently conformable to the dictates of sound reason and of common sense.†

“that in all cases where vessels should be captured or detained on just suspicion of having on board enemy’s property, or of carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war, the said vessel should be brought to the nearest and most convenient port; and if any property of an enemy should be found on board such vessel, that part only which belonged to the enemy should be made prize, and the vessel should be at liberty to proceed with the remainder, without any impediment.—2 Laws U. S. 483— and by our convention with France of the 30th September 1800, art. 20, it was agreed, that in case the vessels of either party should be captured for carrying contraband to the enemy, the contraband goods only should be condemned, “saving always the ship and the other goods which it should contain.” 6 Laws U. S. append. xxxii. T.

† At present, neutral ships are not confiscated for carrying contraband goods to the enemy, though with the master’s knowledge. The Neutralitet, 3 Rob. 240. The Mercurius, 1 Rob. 242. The Jonge Tobias, 1 Rob. 277. Am. edit. T

The same is to be said if the vessel belongs to another person, for Paulus applies his principle to the master only. If, therefore, the master has taken illicit goods on board, without the knowledge of the owners, their ship shall not be confiscated; but the law will be otherwise, if they knew of their being shipped, and thus have become parties to the unlawful act. It would be unjust, that the owners should suffer for the act of the master; but it is right and proper that they should suffer for their own. This distinction between the knowledge and ignorance of the captain is not so frequent at this time as it was formerly, because, according to the present usage, the master is in the habit of signing bills of lading of the merchandize shipped on board of his vessel, by which he promises that he will take good care of it for the shippers. It may, however, still apply, if nevertheless, unlawful goods should be privately conveyed on board of the vessel, without the knowledge of the master. But as to owners of the ship, others than the master, the rule may have even now a frequent application.

As to the owners of the goods, I think, that for the same reason, a distinction ought also to be made, as I have said above, and it ought to be distinguished, whether all the goods belong to one and the same person, or to several. If to one and the same, I think that the whole may justly be confiscated, exactly as by the Roman law in revenue cases, if any one carries at the same time lawful and unlawful merchandize, and declares the one and conceals the other, both are confiscated on account of the fraud of the carrier, as the commentators on the title of the Digest *De Publicanis & Vectigalibus have properly collected from the text of that law itself, and from the third law of the code De Nautico Fœnore.† Others are pleased with another distinction, to wit: whether the lawful goods may be easily separated from the unlawful; if they cannot, then they are of opinion, that the whole is to be condemned, otherwise the contraband goods alone are to be confiscated, and the remainder to be released without considering whether it belongs to the same owner or not. But this distinction, as the separation can always be made, is neither founded on reason, nor on any authority of law. It is more reasonable, and at the same time more consonant to legal principles, to distinguish whether the lawful goods belong to another than the author of the fraud; then the principle properly applies, that one person should not be deprived of his goods for the fraud of another. This doctrine may be supported by a variety of authorities taken from the Roman law, in analogous cases; as if one of several co-heirs defrauds the revenue of the tax on dutiable property belonging to the estate of the deceased, the shares of the other heirs are not on that account to be confiscated.* In the same manner, if the farmer or servants of a landholder should manufacture iron on his estate, contrary to law,† if it should be done without the knowledge of the owner, he shall not suffer any penalty,‡ nor shall the bottomry or respondentia creditor suffer, if by the fraud of his debtor in shipping unlawful goods, the ship and cargo should be confiscated.§

But what if the owners of lawful goods should merely have known that others had laden unlawful merchandize on board of the same vessel? Shall this mere knowledge occasion also the confiscation of the lawful goods. Such appears to have been the opinion of a certain lawyer, which is recorded in the Consilia Belgica;¶ but I do not agree with him, nor do I find that he is supported by any authority; he might, perhaps, have appealed, (though he does not do it), to the abovementioned text of the Digest, where it is said, that the owner is not to suffer, if his farmer or servants have manufactured iron upon his estate without his knowledge: from whence he might have implied, that if the same thing is done with the knowledge of the owner, he ought to be punished, because it was his duty to forbid it, and to order his farmer and servants not to do any thing unlawful upon his estate. But, if several owners, as is often the case, ship their goods on board of the same vessel, they have no control over each other, nor over the master who receives the goods on freight. Therefore, the owner of the lawful goods ought not to suffer for what he cannot prohibit; he might, indeed, not have shipped his goods on board of that vessel, but if it was not convenient for him so to do, he cannot be made answerable for the act or fraud of another person.*

Such is my opinion, and I wish that the several treaties and edicts which I have cited, had spoken more explicitly upon the subject. It will be said, perhaps, that the distinctions which are not therein expressed, are to be tacitly understood, and that thus the treaties and edicts may be interpreted according to each particular case. I wish that I could be of that opinion; but I fear that it cannot be done, because of the too great generality of the expressions. What Albericus Gentilis has written on all these subjects, is full of obscurity and confusion.†

* By the law of France, if a vessel is captured with contraband on board going to the enemy, the contraband goods only are forfeited, but the vessel and the remainder of the cargo are to be released, unless the contraband articles amount to three-fourths of the cargo, in which case, the whole of the merchandize on board is to be condemned, as well as the ship. Ordin. of the 26th of July 1778, art. 1. 2. Code des Prises, 672, edit. 1784.

The rule in England, is to condemn only the contraband articles, and to restore the rest of the cargo and the ship, but without freight; provided, however, that they belong to a different owner from that of the illicit goods, who did not know of the illegality of the voyage, and was not by himself or his agent, concerned in any fraud or concealment, to impose upon the officers of the belligerent nation, by masking the real destination of the ship, covering enemy's property, or otherwise, and was not acting in violation of a treaty of his own country.—The Mercurius, Meincke, 1 Rob. 242.—The Mercurius, Geddes, ibid. 70.—The Jonge Tobias, ibid. 278.—The Princesa, 2 Rob. 42.—The Rosalie & Betty, ibid. 292.—The Franklin, 3 Rob. 183.—The Neutralitæi, 3 Rob. 240. Amer. edit. T.

CHAPTER XIII.

Of Neutral Goods found on board of the ships of enemies.

IN the year 1602, after the conquest of Portugal by the Spaniards, several Portuguese ships were captured by the Dutch, who were then at war with Spain. Grotius, who relates the fact,* says, “that it was more difficult to decide whether the goods of the Italians which were found on board of the captured ships, were lawful prize,” and he adds, “that the matter was decided by a compromise between equity and the law of war.” That respectable writer, therefore, doubted whether neutral goods found on board the ships of enemies, were to be considered as enemy goods; but he entertained no such doubt in 1625, when he wrote his treatise De Jure Belli ac Pacis; for in that work he expressly says: “That nothing is acquired by the law of war, but what belongs to the enemy, and not the property of neutrals, although it be found on the enemy’s territory;” and he infers from thence, that the vulgar saying, “that goods found on board of an enemy’s ships are to be considered as belonging to the enemy,” is not warranted by the law of nations, but that such are only to be presumed enemy goods, until the contrary is proved. He adds, that it was so decided in Holland, in full court, in the year 1338, while we were at war with the Hanse Towns, and that that decision has passed into a law.† He gives it his approbation in another place, where he treats of the same subject.‡

I must own, that I blush at my ignorance, for not having been able to find that decision of the year 1338, nor can I understand by what court it was pronounced; for it is a fact of public notoriety, that it was not until near a century afterwards, that the court of Holland was instituted by Philip of Burgundy. This, indeed, was corrected by Grotius, in a new edition of his book, in which he substituted the year 1438 instead of 1338.* But in the latest edition, published in 1632, in the octavo form, (which Grotius himself certifies to be entirely correct), the year 1338 is again mentioned, and this date has been followed by those who have quoted that passage out of his book.† Even my learned friend Barbeyrac has preserved the same year 1338, in his French translation of Grotius,‡ and attributes that decree to the states-general, although they never exercised judicial powers, nor ever were considered as a court of judicature; at any rate, the true date of it must be the year 1438, as Grotius alludes to the Hanseatic war, of which there is a book preserved among the archives of the court of Holland, entitled Oosterlingen.§

Although that decree of the year 1438, has escaped my diligent inquiry, I nevertheless believe Grotius's assertion, without requiring any other proof of the fact, and I can easily conceive how others have followed his opinion on the credit of his character alone, and without its being supported by any other authority. Thus Loccenius|| speaks of the principle which Grotius lays down as being established law, and so do the six advocates whose opinions are recorded in Consilia Belgica.¶ I think, however, that they go too far when they seem to intimate that it would be otherwise if public notice had been given that no neutral should ship his goods on board of an enemy's vessel, or if he who shipped them, was ignorant of the war.*

If by the general law of nations, it is lawful for a neutral to ship his goods on board of an enemy's vessel, I cannot conceive how it can be rendered otherwise by the proclamation of a belligerent sovereign. I am at liberty to carry on trade with two nations, who are in friendship with me, but at war with each other, unless I am prevented by express or tacit conventions, (as is almost always the case with respect to contraband;) what, then, if one of those nations, without the consent of the other, should prohibit altogether my trading with her enemy? Such an interdiction would be unjust as to all but the subjects of the prohibiting nation. Grotius appears to have been of this opinion,† otherwise he justly thinks that respect is due to the public proclamations of sovereigns, and that they are not to be disregarded with impunity.

As to the other point, what matters it, whether he who has shipped his goods on board of the enemy's ship, did or did not know of the war? Suppose that he did know of it, and that he also knew that the ship belonged to an enemy, the question will still recur, whether he has acted lawfully or unlawfully in shipping the goods? These fine spun niceties, although they may serve to make a display of legal ingenuity, cannot fail to be rejected by those who follow the rules of plain unsophisticated common sense.

Before I express my own opinion, I must first consult the treaties which have been made between different nations upon the subject. As far as I can understand, they nearly agree with the French law, which is laid down by Mornac,‡ que la robe de l'ennemi confisque celle de l'ami.§ Grotius|| attempts to explain away the rigour of this law, and understands it to mean, that if enemy goods are shipped on board of a neutral vessel, with the consent of the owner of the ship, then the ship herself, though neutral, is liable to confiscation.* But this is not the subject before us, and will be treated in the next chapter. If, however, the consent of the owner of the vessel is the cause of her confiscation, why do we not confiscate neutral goods, which, with their owner's consent, are shipped on board of an enemy's vessel? Of this, Grotius has said nothing, and yet the rule of reciprocity required that the same law should be applied to both cases.

But if, setting aside for a moment these considerations, we turn to the treaties themselves: we shall find that they all simply stipulate, that "neutral goods found on board of an enemy's vessel, are liable to confiscation."† In this they have adopted the principle of the old French law, which confiscates the goods of neutrals merely because they are found on board of the vessel of an enemy,‡ and therefore do not agree with what Grotius states to have been decided by the court of Holland,

* But Valin rebukes him strongly for entertaining this opinion. "Grotius," says he, "pretends that our ordinances are to be understood with this restriction; it would, if it were admitted, furnish an excuse to the neutral master, with which he never would fail to elude the confiscation of his vessel and the remainder of his cargo." Valin, Traité des Prises, p. 64.

There is no doubt that such was the ancient law of France, and that it confiscated alike neutral goods found on board the enemy's ships, and neutral ships carrying enemy's goods; so true it is, that injustice has always followed power. T.

† Marine treaty between Spain and the states-general of the 17th December 1650, art. 13.—Treaty of commerce between France and the states-general of the 27th of April 1662, art. 35.—Treaty between the same powers of the 10th of August 1678, art. 22.—Of the 20th of September 1697, art. 27.—11th of April 1713, art. 26.—Between England and the states-general, 1st of December 1674, art. 8.—Sweden and the states-general of the 26th of November 1675, art. —. And 12th of October 1679, art. 22.

‡ But by the same treaties, as will be seen in the next chapter, it was on the other hand stipulated that enemy's goods found on board of neutral ships should not be liable to confiscation, or in other words, that free ships should make free goods; so that if, in one respect, they were conformable to the old severe law of France, they established upon the whole, the more equitable principles of the modern law of nations. T.

and to have obtained the force of a law. It is true, that the treaties which I have related are subsequent, and that they are of no force except between those who are parties to them. But the rule which they establish cannot be defended on rational principles: for why should I not be allowed to make use of my friend's ship to carry my property, notwithstanding his being at war with you? If treaties do not prohibit, I am at liberty, as I have already said, to trade with your enemy; and if so, I may likewise enter into any kind of contract with him, buy, sell, let, hire, &c. Therefore, if I have engaged his vessel and his labour, to carry my goods across the seas, I have done that which was lawful on every principle. You, as his enemy, may take and confiscate his ship, but by what law will you also take and confiscate the goods that belong to me, who am your friend? All that I am bound to do, is, to prove that they are really mine; for here I agree with Grotius, that there is some room for presuming, that goods found on board of an enemy's vessels are the property of the enemy.

But what shall we say, if the owners of the goods knew and consented that they should be shipped on board of the vessel of their friend, indeed, but of your enemy? I should think that this knowledge and consent do not authorize a confiscation. The matter depends upon this only question, whether the owners of the goods, in shipping them on board of an enemy's vessel have acted lawfully or unlawfully? I have contended for the former position, because, as I may lawfully carry on any kind of trade with your enemy, I think that I may therefore enter with him into any kind of contract, and make use, for a valuable consideration, of his ship for my own utility. Take, if you can, every thing which belongs to your enemy, but restore to me what is my own, because I am your friend, and in shipping my goods, I have not intended to do you any injury.

With what I have said, nearly agrees what is laid down in the Consolato del Mare, to wit: "that the enemy's ship when taken, belongs to the captors, and the neutral goods to the owners thereof, but that those owners may, if they are present, compound for the purchase of the vessel, and thus be enabled to prosecute their voyage.* If, however, a composition does not take place, the vessel may be carried into a port of the captor, but still the goods are to be restored to their owners, on paying the freight thereof, in the same manner as if the voyage had been performed." I approve of this general doctrine; but what is said there on the subject of freight, I cannot admit to be founded in law. I understand very well, that he who has taken the vessel, has also taken all the right arising out of it which belonged to her or to the master; but the freight was not due to the ship, nor to the captain, unless the goods had been carried to their destined port.† The question, however, is asked, whether, if a ship is taken in the course of her voyage, the owner of the goods on board is obliged to pay freight to the captor? I answer, that if the captor is ready to carry the ship with the goods to the place of their destination, I think that he is entitled to demand his freight, otherwise I am of opinion that he is not. The shipper is sufficiently punished for his imprudence, in putting his goods on board an enemy's vessel, when he is obliged to claim them at his own expense, and to carry them away at his own risk. I have shewn, in a former chapter,‡ that difficult questions will arise respecting this matter of freight, and that it requires a sound judgment to form a correct opinion upon them.

CHAPTER XIV.

Of Enemy's Goods found on board of neutral ships.

IF a neutral ship be taken, having enemy's property on board, two questions are to be considered: the one, whether the neutral ship itself, the other, whether the enemy's goods are liable to confiscation?

As to the first question, if we follow the ancient law of France, a neutral ship will be liable to confiscation for carrying enemy's goods. That such was the law of France, in ancient times, is clear, by the exemption from it granted to the Hanse Towns, in their treaty with that country of the 10th of May 1655. Grotius, in the passage mentioned in the preceding chapter, is of opinion, that the French law does not extend farther than to the case of a neutral ship, the owner of which knowingly receives enemy's goods on board,* relying on that law of the Digest† in which, as I have said above,‡ a distinction is made between the master's knowing and his being ignorant of unlawful goods being laden on board of his ship; in the first case, but not in the second, the law directs the ship to be confiscated. Loccenius§ also distinguishes the present case in the same manner.

* See the note * p. 103.

If, however, it shall have been done in the absence of the owner, by the master, mate, or some of the mariners, they shall be capitally punished, and the goods shall be confiscated, but the ship shall be restored to the owners. ff. de Public. & Vectig. l. 11. § 2

‡ C. 12. p. 94

This distinction of *Paulus between the knowledge and ignorance of the master of the ship, is certainly very important, and has been very much attended to in the Roman law, but now is hardly of any force if the vessel belongs to the master himself; for it is generally he who receives the goods, and who attests their shipment by an instrument commonly called a bill of lading. It is of greater use, if the ship belongs to other owners than the captain, and he has received the goods without their knowledge, as I have already shewn in another place.† It may, however, be doubted, whether other owners, if they have given a special authority to the master to take goods on freight, and he has shipped unlawful merchandize, are not bound for his act? In general the rule is, that he who entrusts an unfit person with his business, is answerable for his faults and for the frauds that he commits; and if a distinction is made between the master and another owner of the vessel, the question will present itself in a pretty difficult point of view. But this is not the ground that I go upon. I am willing to admit, that the owners of the ship are bound for the act of the master, even without having given him a special authority; that the receiving of the goods was ordered by the owner himself, and that he knew in every case what goods were shipped on board of his vessel, and to whom they belonged; notwithstanding all that, I see no reason for confiscating the ship, merely for having enemy's property on board, whether or not the owner knew of or gave his consent to it.

I do not grant to Grotius, that the case which Paulus speaks of in the passage which he cites, extends to that which we are now contending about. Not because in those things which depend solely upon reason, the principles of the law of nations may not safely be sought for in the rules of Roman jurisprudence, but because the doctrine of Paulus has no application here. He only speaks of a master of a vessel, who, knowingly or unknowingly, carries goods in fraud of the revenue. In that case, it is true, that if the master acts with full knowledge of the circumstances, he employs his vessel and his labour for an unlawful purpose, and she is justly liable to confiscation; for he who conceals and knowingly carries on board of his vessel, goods which ought to be declared for the purpose of paying the duties thereon, commits a fraud upon the public. And therefore, at present, by the laws of almost every country, ships which are employed in defrauding the revenue, are confiscated, for no other reason than that they are employed in an illegal act.

I have myself adopted the same distinction of Paulus, with respect to contraband goods,* and have given it as my opinion, that if such goods were shipped on board of a neutral vessel, to be carried to the enemy, with the knowledge of the owners, the ship itself is also liable to be confiscated, unless there should be treaties to the contrary; because the owners in such a case are concerned in an act prohibited by law.

But now, let us pause and consider, whether he is guilty of any offence against the law of nations, who carries on board of his vessel the goods of his friend, although that friend is your enemy? By what right will you, who are my friend, capture my ship, merely because she carries your enemy's goods? I, who am a friend to both parties, shall serve them both, in those things that are not hurtful to either, and in the same manner both will serve me in things that are indifferent. On this principle, your enemy may with propriety hire his vessel out to me, and I am at liberty to hire mine out to him. Of those who act thus innocently and without fraud, I have treated more at large in the preceding chapter, and if what I have said there is correct, there is no need of saying any more upon this question, but it must be laid down as a principle, that a neutral vessel is not liable to be confiscated for having enemy's goods on board, whether the owner of the vessel knew of it, or not; because, in either case, he knew that he was engaged in a lawful trade; and in this his case differs from that of him who knowingly carries contraband goods to the enemy. Wherefore, on the present question, I do not admit the application of the distinction made by Paulus; but I approve of the opinion which was given in general terms by the Dutch lawyers, and is recorded in the Consilia Belgica,* that a neutral ship, although laden with enemy's goods, is not liable to confiscation.

We will now proceed to consider the second question, whether the enemy's goods themselves, taken on board of a neutral vessel are liable to confiscation? Some will wonder, perhaps, that any doubt should be entertained about it, as it is clearly lawful for a belligerent to take the property of his enemy. And yet, in all the treaties which I have cited in the preceding chapter,† there is an express stipulation, that "enemy's goods found on board of neutral vessels, shall be free," or, (as we commonly express it), that free ships shall make free goods, except, however, contraband of war, when carrying to the enemy. And what will be thought more astonishing is, that among those treaties there are four to which France is a party, and according to them, even enemy's goods laden on board of neutral vessels are not liable to confiscation; much less, therefore, ought the neutral vessel to be confiscated, on board of which they are shipped. So that it must be said, either that the principle of the old French law which I have above mentioned, has been entirely abandoned, or, what is more probable, that those treaties are to be considered as exceptions to it. However this may be, we are bound, in the discussion of general principles, to attend more to reason than to treaties. And on rational grounds, I cannot see why it should not be lawful to take enemy's goods, although found on board of a neutral ship; for in that case, what the belligerent takes is still the property of his enemy, and by the laws of war, belongs to the captor.

It will be said, perhaps, that a belligerent may not lawfully take his enemy's goods on board of a neutral vessel, unless he should first take the neutral vessel itself; that he cannot do this without committing an act of violence upon his friend, in order to come at the property of his enemy, and that it is quite as unlawful as if he were to attack that enemy in a neutral port.

* Vol. 4. Consil 206. n. 2.

or to commit depredations in the territory of a friend.* But it ought to be observed, that it is lawful to detain a neutral vessel, in order to ascertain, not by the flag merely, which may be fraudulently assumed, but by the documents themselves which are on board, whether she is really neutral. If she appear to be such, then she is to be dismissed, otherwise, she may be captured. And if this is lawful, as on every principle it is, and as it is generally practised, it will be lawful also to examine the documents which concern the cargo, and from thence to learn, whether there are enemy's goods concealed on board, and if any should be found, why may they not be captured by the law of war? The Dutch lawyers, whose opinion I have already cited,† and the Consolato del Mare, in the chapter above referred to,‡ are equally clear upon this point. According to them, the neutral ship is to be released; but the enemy's goods are to be carried into a port of the captor, and there condemned.§

* It is worthy of observation, that our author, while he supports the belligerent principle, on the long agitated question, whether free ships "do or do not make free goods," tacitly admits, that neutral vessels are entitled to be considered as neutral territory, a proposition which Mr. Hubner thought so self-evident, that he did not think it worth while (though he professedly wrote in favour of the neutral doctrine) to devote a single page of his work to its proof and development. Hubn. de la Saisie &c. vol. 1. p. 211. This principle being admitted, the question is reduced to the single point: "Whether the right of taking enemy's property on board of neutral vessels, necessarily follows as a consequence of the right of search, for the purpose of ascertaining their neutral character?" On this point alone, the whole of our author's argument turns, and he maintains the affirmative; but like Hubner, he takes his proposition for granted, without taking any pains to demonstrate it. On the whole, he must be considered as having made a very important concession in favour of neutrals, and having greatly narrowed for them the field of that celebrated controversy. T.

§ Above, p. 104. This opinion of our author is adopted, as we have shewn before, p. 105. in the case of neutral goods found on board of an enemy's vessel; but the contrary rule universally takes place in the case of enemy's goods taken on board of a neutral ship, in which case, as we have observed above, p. 81, the owner of the vessel is entitled to his freight, though he has not carried the goods to the place of their destination. Such is the opinion of Those authorities say further, that the captor must pay the freight to the master of the vessel, but I do not think that opinion reasonable, because freight is not due, unless the goods have been carried to their port of destination. It may, indeed, be said, and with great truth, that it was not the fault of the master, that he did not carry them; but it must be said also, that when he took enemy's goods on board of his ship, he did it at his own peril, as he must have known that they might be taken, and thus be carried into a port of the captor. Therefore, he has no cause to complain, if his ship be merely dismissed without paying him any freight; unless it should be agreed between him and the captor, that he should carry the enemy's goods to the place of their destination, and thus have hired his vessel out to the captor himself. I have argued on this same principle in the preceding chapter, but in a case directly opposite; being that of neutral goods and an enemy's vessel.*

I shall not now turn to the particular cases in which this subject has been discussed. The reader, if he approves of the principles which I have laid down, will be able to form a correct judgment of what is said by Albericus Gentilis,† and Zouch,‡ on the same question, and of the controversy, which, as the latter relates, was once agitated with so much warmth between the English and the Zealanders.§ Zouch, himself, is Vattel, which is at this day generally considered as law." Si l'on trouve sur un vaisseau neutre des effets appartenants aux ennemis, on s'en saisit par le droit de la guerre: mais naturellement on doit payer le fret au maître du vaisseau, qui ne peut souffrir de cette saisie. If on board of a neutral vessel, goods are found belonging to the enemy, they are seized by the law of war: but naturally, the freight is to be paid to the master of the vessel, who cannot suffer from that seizure." Vatt. L. of N. l. 3. c. 7. § 115. Such is also the rule in England, though very much restricted, and rendered almost illusory in practice. The Atlas, 3 Rob. 243. Am. edit. in not. The Emanuel, 1 Rob. 249. The Rebecca, 2 Rob. 84. The Immanuel, ibid. 172. Am. ed.

The reason of this rule is very plain, enemy's goods are not, like contraband, seized and confiscated, ex delicto, but merely ex re; for, he who carries enemy's property, is not guilty of any offence against the law of nations, as our author himself has ably demonstrated, above p. 108. T.

§ It is related by Zouch, that in the year 1576, the merchants of the Spanish Netherlands, being in the habit of carrying on their commerce with of opinion, that the neutral vessel ought to be released, and the enemy's goods confiscated; but, he thinks that freight ought to be paid to the master, in which he agrees with the Consolato del Mare, but not with me. He is, however, for allowing such freight only pro ratâ itineris peracti.* If his doctrine were correct, as in my opinion it is not, it would be very difficult to explain this restriction, on satisfactory principles.†

After writing thus much, the works of the learned Heinecius have come to my hands, and among them his dissertation “On the confiscation of ships for carrying prohibited goods,”‡ in which§ he briefly considers the two questions which are the subject of this and the preceding chapter. The perusal of that treatise has not induced me in the least to alter my opinion; I am, on the contrary, confirmed in it by the authority of so great a man. If the reader will take the trouble to compare what has been said by each of us on the same subject, he will be satisfied of the reason why I have not thought it necessary to make any alteration in this chapter, or in that which immediately precedes it.

Spain, then at war with the United Provinces, under cover of the English flag, the privateers of Zealand captured several English vessels engaged in that trade, and had them condemned as prize in their court of admiralty. He adds, that the English complained of it, and by way of retaliation, detained the ships of the Zealanders which they found in the ports of England, and imprisoned their commanders. But the prince of Orange prevailed upon the queen to accept of a compromise, by which the property taken was restored on both sides. Zouch, ubi supra. T.

* In proportion to the voyage performed. T.

† We have shewn in former notes, p. 81. 110. that contrary to the opinion of our author, freight is generally allowed to the neutral master in the prize-courts of Europe. And it is not only paid to him, as Zouch would have it, pro ratâ itineris, but in toto, and as if the whole voyage had been performed. The reason given for it, which appears founded on very sound principles, is, “that the captor represents his enemy, by possessing himself of his goods, jure belli; and that, although the whole freight has not been earned by the completion of the voyage, yet, as the captor, by his act of seizure, has prevented its completion, his seizure shall operate to the same effect as an actual delivery of the goods to the consignee, and shall subject him to the payment of the full freight.” The Copenhagen, 1 Rob.245. Amer. edit. T

Of the Right of Postliminy on neutral territory.

IT has been questioned whether this right extends to persons or things, which, after being taken by an enemy, are carried by him into the territory of a neutral. It might be supposed that this question is settled by that passage from the Digest, in which Pomponius says, “that one of our people who has been taken by the enemy, is understood to be returned among us, if he arrives among our friends or upon our territory;”* and as the same law which, on the subject of postliminy, applies to persons, applies also to things, there does not appear to be any further room for controversy; for it seems, that under the general denomination of friends, Pomponius has meant to include neutrals, who are certainly entitled to that appellation. But Grotius construes it in a different manner;† he thinks, and in my opinion justly, that by the word friends are not generally to be understood, all those who are at peace with us, but only those who are engaged with us in the same war. He gives the same interpretation to what is said by Paulus, that “those are considered as having returned to us by right of postliminy, not only who have actually entered our territory, but who have arrived within the dominions of a friend or ally; because there they begin to be under the safeguard of the public faith.”‡

If we take the words “OR an ally” conjunctively, (which we may, perhaps, do, in the same manner that we frequently construe a conjunctive into a disjunctive), Paulus’s opinion will support the interpretation of Grotius; for an ally certainly

* ff. de Capt. & Postlim. Revers. l. 5. § 1.

comes within the description of the word friend. If, however, we take it in the disjunctive sense, it will be sufficient that it be a neutral or friendly, though not an allied nation. Of this opinion is Albericus Gentilis;* but he is clearly in the wrong; because the reason which Paulus gives, that the person who was taken begins, when on a friend's territory, to be under the safeguard of the public faith, applies as well and rather more to an ally than to a mere friend.

Of the same opinion with Grotius, and before him, was Antonio de Gama,† whom Gentilis on that account undertook to refute. Zouch,‡ according to his custom, contents himself with relating the different opinions of others, and gives none himself, though he rather appears to incline to that of Gentilis. As to Grotius, he supports what he says merely by the authority of precedents, without adding a single argument of his own. "Among those," says he, "who are friends, but not allies, prisoners of war do not change their condition, unless it be so specially agreed by treaty," and by way of example, he immediately quotes the second treaty between the Carthaginians and Romans;§ but Zouch very properly observes, that it does not sufficiently appear whether what the two nations agreed upon together is to be considered as a declaration of the law of nations, or as an exception to it. In various treaties, among the most ancient as well as the most modern, this is a question which it is often difficult to decide; and it is always dangerous to infer the law of nations merely from treaties, without also consulting reason. Grotius adds, in his notes, that it appears from Thuanus, that the king of Fez and Morocco was of the same opinion with him; but no one will be willing to be instructed by such masters in the law of nations.

* De Advoc. Hisp. l. 1. c. 1.

‡ De Jure Fec. p. 2. § 8. Q. 2.

§ It was stipulated by that treaty, that if the prisoners made by the Carthaginians on some nation in friendship with the Romans, should come into the countries under the Roman dominion, they might be reclaimed, and should again become free; and that the friends of the Carthaginians should have the same right within the Punic dominions. Grot. ubi supra.

As to other writers, *Huberus is of the same opinion with Grotius, when he understands by the word returned, one who is come back into the territory of an ally. Hertius† agrees also with him, and considers the right of postliminy as not being founded on the law of nations, but on municipal law. He decides on the question so often discussed among nations, “whether a prisoner of war, or captured property, which is brought into a neutral country, are entitled to their liberty by the right of postliminy?” He maintains that they are not; “because,” says he, “neutrals are bound ‘to take the fact for the law,’ and therefore cannot say that the capture was illegally made.”‡

But, indeed, if we chuse to consider this subject by the mere light of reason, this question appears to me so idle, that I wonder that it has exercised the minds of so many writers. He who returns among the allies of his sovereign, is entitled to the right of postliminy, because he is considered as having returned to his own country, for allies are considered as making but one state with ourselves.§ Certainly they are not to be considered as separate nations in respect to the war in which they unite their forces and mutual assistance. Therefore, by the word friends, which Pomponius|| makes use of, I would understand those who are such in the highest degree, that is to say, who are in alliance with us against the same enemy; and by Paulus’s expression,¶ “a friend or ally,”

† Adnot. ad Puffend. De Jure N. and G. l. 8. c. 6. n. 25.

‡ Such is also the opinion of all the modern writers, and particularly of Vattel. Le droit de postliminie n’a point lieu chez les peuples neutres; car quiconque veut demeurer neutre dans une guerre est obligé de la considérer quant à ses effets, comme également juste de part & d’autre, & par conséquent de regarder comme bien acquis tout ce qui est pris par l’un ou l’autre parti. The right of postliminy does not take place among neutral nations; for whoever will remain neutral in a war, is obliged to look upon it, as to its effects, as being equally just on both sides, and consequently to consider as a lawful acquisition whatever is captured by either party. § Unam constituunt Civitatem. See the Henrick and Maria, 4 Rob. 49. Amer. edit. T.

I would understand him, who is at the same time in friendship and in alliance with us; for otherwise, it would have been sufficient to have made use of the word friend.* With such alone, because of the alliance, the right of postliminy

* The doctrine of postliminy, among the ancient Romans, applied principally to persons, it being the practice at the time when that country flourished, to make slaves of prisoners taken in war. To such, Pomponius and Paulus particularly meant to apply their principles on this subject, and therefore, it is not easy to refer them to the case of ships and goods taken at sea in a modern maritime war. Nor does it sufficiently appear whether those authors meant to speak of prisoners who made their escape into a friendly or allied country, as well as of those who came thither in the possession of their masters who had purchased them from the captors. It is possible, that a different rule might have obtained in each of these different cases. The civilians take too much pains to apply the principles of the Roman law to every case that presents itself; not considering, that the difference between ancient and modern manners renders them, in many instances, little susceptible of a direct application.

There would be, in our opinion, little difficulty in settling this question of postliminy on neutral territory, if a proper attention were paid to the distinction which the law has established between military and civil rights. We call military rights those which belligerents acquire in war, by capture or conquest, to the property of their enemies, and civil rights, those which are acquired out of war by contract or otherwise. These different rights receive a different kind of proof. Military rights are evidenced by possession, and civil rights by the ordinary proofs of title. A prize, therefore, which is brought into a neutral territory, in the possession of the captors or of their agents, does not return to its former owner, by the law of postliminy, because neutrals are bound to take notice of the military right which the possession evidences. But they are not bound to receive any other proof of it than the possession itself; for with the mere right of property of the captor they have nothing to do; the right of possession is the only thing that they cannot controvert, and in that, as Hertius says, they are bound to take the fact for the law. If, therefore, a vessel, after capture, should escape, or be brought into a neutral territory by others than the captor, his agents, or those who otherwise lawfully claim under him, as there is no longer any legal evidence of the military right, no fact which is to be taken for law, the civil right of the former owner revives, and the property returns to him by the law of postliminy. We do not mean to speak here of property regularly condemned in the tribunals of the captor; such a condemnation converts the military into a civil right, of which the sentence is the legal evidence.

For want of attending to these distinctions, the broad and unqualified propositions of our author have led many into an error. T.

takes place, but with those who are merely friends to both parties, the state or condition of our citizens, or of our property, does not change, because there is no reason for it. Wherefore, I wonder that Gentilis and others have been of opinion, that every thing which is brought into the dominions of a neutral country, returns by postliminy, and as a consequence thereof, that prisoners carried into the territory of a friend, become free.*

This doctrine, as to prisoners, is roundly asserted by Joannes de Immola,† and Petrinus Bellus,‡ with whom Zouch appears to concur in sentiment.§ But the contrary is so plain, that even sceptics have never seriously entertained a doubt of it; for all unanimously agree, that a right of property is acquired by capture in war, and that that right continues in the country of a friend. And if it be true, that the prizes which I have taken, and the prisoners that I have made, remain my property, by what right shall a prince, who is my friend, take from me those things which belong to me, pleno jure, and give

* By the law of nations, as at present understood, the right of postliminy takes place with respect to persons, even in a neutral country. For the moment that a prisoner sets his foot on neutral territory, no force whatever of the belligerent can protect him. "A privateer," says Vattel, "carries his prize into a neutral port, and there freely sells it; but he would not be allowed to put his prisoners ashore, in order to confine them; for to keep or detain prisoners of war, in order to confine them, is a continuation of hostilities." Law of Nat. l. 3. c. 7. § 132. True, the captor may confine them on board of his ship, even though in the neutral's port, or within his jurisdiction; because a ship is considered as it were a part of the territory of the sovereign to whom it belongs. (See above, p. 109, 110.), but beyond that, no force can lawfully be exercised by a belligerent on persons in a neutral country.

If, however, a passage should be granted to a body of land troops through a neutral territory, there is no doubt that they might keep under confinement the prisoners that they had with them. For this power would be incident to the right of passage, which otherwise would not be effectually granted. And an army (as well as a fleet) is considered, wherever it may be, in many respects, as a presidium of the nation to whom it belongs. See above, p. 29.

them up to another, though he be equally his friend? It is sufficiently clear, that he cannot do it without injuring me. Nor can he do it by his courts of justice, for he cannot lawfully judge between me and my enemy, without the agreement of both.* As therefore, what is taken in war remains the property of the captor, though in a neutral country, the Swedish ambassador was wrong, when, in the year 1657, he claimed certain letters of his, which had been intercepted by the Danes, with whom his sovereign was at war, and delivered to the states-general, who were his friends; contending that, by that delivery they had again become his own.†

Treaties, however, are sometimes made between sovereigns on a different principle, as was the case formerly between the Romans and Carthaginians, by the second treaty which Grotius quotes from Polybius. And thus, by the 20th article of the treaty of peace between the king of Portugal and the states-general of the 6th of August 1661, it was stipulated, that “what should be taken by the enemy of either, and carried into the port of the other, if demanded within a certain time, should be restored.” But such conventions cannot be made without injury to him who carries his prizes into the territory of his friend as into a safe place. Therefore, they effect no change in the principles of reason, or of the law of nations. For more upon this subject, see Cunæus’s dissertation De Causâ Postliminii, and Loccenius, De Jure Maritimo,‡ where the arguments of Cunæus are briefly stated.||

* As between the belligerents, the neutral is bound to see right wherever he sees possession: of a right unaccompanied with possession, he cannot take notice. We mean to speak only of rights acquired by or founded on the law of war, for of other rights he may judge as if no war existed. T.

This, however, is true only as to captures made in a just war, for if any thing has been taken by pirates, it is by all means to be restored to the former owners; and so it has been stipulated in various treaties between different nations.* And it is a rule generally adopted among all the nations of Europe, that a capture by pirates does not change the property, which subject has been treated more at large by others, as I shall shew hereafter.†

Agreeably to these principles, if my property, captured by enemies, comes into the territory of an ally, it returns to my use, and hence it is considered as if it had been delivered by my ally from the common enemy. § Aitzema relates, that France being in alliance with Holland, and both being at war with Spain, the French had refused to restore to the Dutch.

It is more doubtful, whether a captor may in a neutral territory, sell the thing which he has taken from his enemy, and recover the price of the sale? By the 12th article of the treaty of peace between the United Provinces and England, of the 4th of September 1662, it was provided, that in such a case, if the consideration of the sale had not been paid to the captor, the property should return to its former owner, which article, in a particular case, that happened afterwards, the states-general ordered to be carried into execution.* But I would wish to know on what principle this stipulation was founded? And how, if the sale of the prize by the captor is lawful, his enemy can be made to derive an advantage from it? It will be difficult to account satisfactorily for this; for it is an established principle, that we may lawfully assist our friends, although enemies to each other, provided we do not supply them with implements of war, and do not shew more favour to one than to the other. It cannot, therefore, be required, that we should shut our ports against them, or prohibit all commercial intercourse between them and our citizens. I am of opinion, that this 12th article is to be classed among special treaties, the reason of which is often concealed from us; for in general, we are free to exercise the rights of their property which they had recaptured from the Spanish privateers; whereupon, the Dutch, by way of retaliation, issued the edict which our author mentions, by which they ordered that no part of the French property which their vessels of war should retake from the Spaniards should be restored to the French, until they should pursue a different line of conduct with respect to them. 2 Aitz. p. 752. fol. ed. T.

* Aitz. l. 44. It is difficult to understand how prohibiting the sale of prizes in a neutral country is tantamount with interdicting all trade with the country of the captors; but this strong language of our author, shews how much he was in favour of the right of the belligerents to sell their prizes in neutral countries; and that this right exists, is not only the opinion of Bynkershoek, but of almost all the writers on the law of nations, and particularly of Vattel in the passage last above cited. The same right, however, should be granted to both parties alike, otherwise, the one to whom it is refused, will have a just right to complain. But neutral governments generally find it inconvenient to permit the privateers of contending nations to frequent their ports with their prizes at the same time, and therefore the right is either only granted to one of the parties, by virtue of a special treaty, or denied to both. T.

ownership over our property in a neutral country, whether we have acquired it by the law of nations, or by the municipal law.

Although it be lawful, on rational principles, to carry a prize into a neutral territory, and there to sell it if the captor thinks proper, laws have, nevertheless, more than once, been made to the contrary. The states-general, on the 9th of August 1658, issued an edict, by which they ordered, that no foreign captor who might be compelled by stress of weather, or some other reasonable cause, to bring his prize into the ports of this country, should presume to sell any part of it, or even to break bulk, but that he should inform the bailiff of the place of his arrival, who, having placed a guard on board of the ship, should keep a strict watch over her, until her departure, inflicting, moreover, a discretionary penalty, and a fine of one thousand florins, on any one that should assist in unlading, or purchase any thing out of her. To which edict, the said states-general, on the 7th of November in the same year, enacted a supplement, by which it was ordered that no prize-ship should be brought into the port itself, but merely into the outer roads, where she might be sheltered from danger, and that nothing should be unladen or sold out of her; and if any one should act to the contrary, the prize should be restored to the former owner, as though it had never been taken, and the captor himself should be detained, and his own vessel seized and confiscated. The remainder of the edict merely confirms that of the ninth of August above mentioned. Whether those edicts were extorted from the states-general, by fear or by any other cause, I do not know; but lest they should hereafter militate against rational principles, we must declare that we rather believe them to have been temporary than perpetual laws.

CHAPTER XVI.

*Of the Right of Postliminy as applied to cities and states.

IT has been very properly said by Grotius,† that “the right of postliminy is applicable to a whole people, as well as to an individual, and that a political body, which was free before, recovers its freedom when its allies, by force of arms, deliver it from the yoke of the enemy.” Hotoman is of the same opinion, but there is some doubt whether this principle has been always and every where observed in the United Netherlands. In the case of Groningen, there is no doubt that it was attended to, as that city and province was admitted into the confederation, after we had reconquered it from the Spaniards, though it is to this day doubtful, whether they had ever before formally signed the articles of Utrecht, and they had certainly renounced them while under the Spanish dominion. Those articles had, however, been signed by the district of Ommelanden, which constitutes much the largest part of that province.

The inhabitants of the district of Drenthe were, on the 11th of April 1580, admitted into the confederation of Utrecht, but their country was afterwards invaded and occupied by the Spaniards. After the enemy had withdrawn and evacuated their territory, it seems clear, that they had recovered all their former rights, by virtue of the law of postliminy. Nevertheless, although they several times petitioned the states-general, to be readmitted into the union, no order has yet been taken upon any of their petitions; and once, in the year 1650, when, after having received a summons, which, it is said, the president of the states-general had signed by mistake, their deputies attended at a meeting of the states, they were refused admittance. This certainly appears to be an act of injustice, particularly as neither the states-general nor the provincial states* have ever given any reason for their refusal to admit them, in which they persist to this day. It may, perhaps, be alleged, that the Drenthers did not renounce their allegiance to the king of Spain, as the other confederates did on the 26th of July 1581; consequently, that they remained under the dominion of the Spaniards, and are to be treated as a conquered country. But I would not exclude them on that account, as I am not clear that they forfeited the privileges of the Dutch union, merely because they did not renounce the king of Spain, nor do I find that this has ever been objected to them. Therefore, I see no reason why the Drenthers should not enjoy the benefit of the law of postliminy.†

The inhabitants of those parts of Brabant, which were under the dominion of the king of Spain, but were afterwards taken by the United Dutch,‡ also petitioned the states-general, in 1648, to be admitted into the confederation of Utrecht; but they were not even permitted to manage their own internal government. Some of the provincial states, however, gave power to their delegates to decide upon that business, but nothing was done in it. The Brabanters again petitioned on the 22d of March 1651, but to no purpose. Their case does not appear to come properly within the principle of the law of postliminy, for none of their cities, except Breda, had ever been admitted into the confederation of Utrecht. But as to the inhabitants of Breda, I entertain the same opinion which I have already expressed with regard to those of the district of Drenthe.

* Of Over-Yssel, within which the territory of Drenthe was included. T.

† They were not, however, admitted to that benefit, and they were still a dependent territory at the time of the invasion of Holland by the French. T.

‡ The districts of Maesland, Kuyck, and Kempenland, with the cities of Boisleduc, Breda, Bergen-op-Zoom and their territories, which constituted what was formerly called Dutch Brabant. T.

The case of Guelderland, Utrecht, and Over-Yssel, three out of the seven united provinces, comes much more properly within the law of postliminy. In the year 1672, they were taken by the French,* and afterwards recovered by us. While they were in the power of the enemy, they certainly were not entitled to their former rights as confederates, and on that account their delegates were very properly ordered not to attend any longer at the meetings of the states-general; but when those provinces again came into our possession, they were with equal propriety, considered as being restored to their former rights, by virtue of the law of postliminy. Indeed, the states-general decreed, on the 20th of April 1674, that those provinces should be restored to their former municipal and confederate rights, as they enjoyed them before their capture, except, however, that they deprived Guelderland of one vote in the assembly of the states, and several other conditions were, in fact, imposed upon them before they were readmitted into the union; for, they were informed, that they should swear anew to the articles of confederation, as if they were admitted for the first time. But if, by the operation of the law of postliminy, every thing is to be restored as if the captivity had not taken place, as it is every where understood, and is conformable to the usage of nations, every thing ought to have been restored to those provinces, which they possessed before their capture. They were, in my opinion, fully entitled to the benefit of the law of postliminy, and if so, why was a part of their rights retained? If, on the contrary, they were not, why was any thing granted to them?

It has been objected, I know, that the decrees of the states-general, on the subject of postliminy, speak of our subjects only, and that no mention is made in them of our allies and confederates; but that was not the question at the time when those decrees were made. Nay, even if the point were to be decided by those decrees, those should certainly be considered as subjects of this state or republic, who constitute so large a part of it. Others are more properly of opinion, that on the subject of postliminy, there ought to be no difference between ourselves and our allies and confederates. Hence the decree of the states-general, of the 23d of October 1676, which I have mentioned above,* grants the benefit of that law, not only to those things which have been taken on board of our vessels, and afterwards recaptured, but also to those which are taken by the enemy, on board of the vessels of allies and of neutrals, and afterwards recaptured by us. I have also herein before shewn, that such was formerly the doctrine adopted by the states-general, and that they blamed the French for having followed a different principle.†

While the kingdom of Portugal was in the possession of the Spaniards, with whom we were at war, the states-general conquered a considerable part of the colony of Brazil, and several others of the Portuguese dominions in different parts of the world. After Portugal had recovered her independence, a truce of ten years was signed between that country and the states-general, in 1640.‡ But our government would not permit that the Portuguese should claim by virtue of the law of postliminy, any part of the dominions which once had belonged to them, and which we had taken from the Spaniards. In 1657, the truce being expired, but before any notice given of the renewal of hostilities, the Portuguese retook some of those places, and on the states-general complaining of it, they refused to restore them, but offered to pay a sum of money by way of compensation, which our government not being disposed to accept, they declared war against Portugal, on the 22d of October 1657. At last this controversy was settled by the treaty of peace which was made on the 6th of August 1661.

The Portuguese were undoubtedly in the right, to claim the dominions which the states-general had taken from them, because the states themselves asserted, that the kingdom of Portugal did not belong to Spain. In addition to this, the Portuguese had been in alliance with the states-general in the war against Spain, so that the places belonging to them which had come into the possession of the Dutch, their allies, were clearly to return to their former sovereign, by virtue of the law of postliminy. It is true, that at the very time when those places came into the power of the Dutch, there was no king of Portugal, but when afterwards, that country was restored to its independency, the Portuguese were entitled to resume the possession of the territories that had been conquered by their allies from the enemies, saving the claim of the states-general for the expenses which they had incurred in taking them.

* C. 5.—† Above, p. 119.

‡ Shortly after the restoration of the house of Braganza to the throne of Portugal, the states-general made a treaty of alliance with that kingdom against Spain, notwithstanding which the two allies remained at war with each other, and although they united their forces against the common enemy, their mutual hostilities were only suspended by a truce of ten years, which was not very religiously observed. Cerisier, Hist. Gen. des Prov. Un. vol. vi. p. 143. — Raynal, Hist. Philos. & Polit. l. 9.

CHAPTER XVII.

Of Pirates.

IT is a principle consonant to reason and sanctioned by the rules of positive law, that things taken by pirates or robbers, do not thereby undergo a change of property, nor require the operation of the law of postliminy to return to their former owners. The authority of the Digest is in point,* and I have shewn in a former chapter,† that this rule has been adopted by several nations in their treaties with each other. I need not, therefore, bring forward the additional authorities of Grotius,‡ Gentilis,§ and Zouch,|| and of a number of other writers. But I shall proceed to examine who are the persons to whom we may properly apply the denomination of pirates and robbers.

We call pirates and plunderers, (prædones) those, who, without the authorization of any sovereign, commit depre-dations by sea or land.¶ Hence, by the law of this country, they ¶ Our author's definition seems to be intended to apply equally to pirates and land-robbers; whereas it might have been expected that he would have given one to be applied exclusively to the former description of men. We have not been able to find one in the books altogether satisfactory, that given by Mr. Hawkins seems deficient, inasmuch as it might possibly be applied to those who sail with, as well as to those who sail without a commission from a sovereign. He defines a pirate, "one who to enrich himself, either by surprise or open force, sets upon merchants or others, trading by sea, to spoil them of their goods and treasure." 1 Hawk. P. C. 267. Independent of the objection which we have made, there appears to be in this definition a great deal of unnecessary redundancy.

are punished as pirates, who sail out for the purpose of making depredations on the enemy, without a commission from the admiral, and without having complied with the requisites of

Were we to presume to offer a definition of our own, we would say, that a pirate is "he, who sailing without being authorized by any sovereign to make captures, (or with commissions from different sovereigns at war with each other), commits depredations at sea or on shore." We say, "or on shore," because it appears to us, that on the principle of the celebrated case of Lindo v. Rodney, Doug. 591. (which, we think, may be extended thus far without straining its analogy), if the crew of an unlicensed cruiser should land on a defenceless coast, there commit depredations and carry off the booty on board of their ship, the act would be piracy; and to be tried in a court having admiralty jurisdiction. This doctrine (if correct) may find its application in case such pirates should be brought or found in a country different from that in which the depredations were committed. There, unless they could be tried as pirates, they could not be tried at all.

We mean to speak here of piracy by the law of nations only, not of that offence as it is considered at the common law. The definition above quoted from Hawkins, was clearly meant by him to apply merely to piracy by the law of nations, for, in the very next page he gives us the common law definition of the same crime, which is very different from the former one. "A pirate," says he, "at the common law, is a person who commits any of those acts of robbery and depredation on the high seas, which, if committed at land, would have amounted to felony." 1 Hawk. P. C. 268. On the same principle, the law of the United States defines piracy in general, the commission at sea, or in a river, haven, bason or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, of murder, robbery, or any other offence, which, if committed within the body of a county, would, by the law of the United States, be punishable with death. Act of the 30th of April 1790. § 8.—1 Laws U. S. 102. Several other offences are made piracy by the same statute, which come within the proper scope of municipal legislation.

Here, then, appear to be two different and distinct species of offences: one against the general law of nations, and the other against the municipal law of the land. The laws which constitute the latter kind of crime, are in some respects more extensive, and in others more restricted than that which defines the former. They are more extensive, in as much as they make piracy of an act of felony committed by an individual at sea, even on board of a commissioned vessel of his own nation, and more restricted, because they require, in order to constitute a piratical act, the commission at sea of a common or statute law felony, whereas the law of nations in its definitions of crimes, does not take notice of the technical rules of the common or any other municipal law.

An important question here occurs: "Whether an act of piracy, clearly considered as such by the law of nations, may be inquired of, and punished by the courts of England or the United States possessing admiralty jurisdiction in criminal cases, although it should not be piracy at the common the law, on the subject of privateering. If an inhabitant of the United Netherlands should sail out under a commission from any foreign prince, or, without the consent of the states-general, should take a foreign commission in addition to one from our own government, he is to be punished by the forfeiture of life and goods, and of the security given on receiving his commission here.* By another law† it is decreed, that those who shall act thus are to be considered as pirates,‡ which is very reasonable, because they might thus commit depredations on the subjects of nations in amity with us, and involve their own sovereign into a war.§ Probably this last law was made on law, nor be expressly provided for by statute? The learned Wooddeson is in favour of the affirmative. "Whether," says he, "a charge amounts to piracy or not, must still depend on the LAW OF NATIONS, except where, in the case of British subjects, express acts of parliament have declared, that the crimes therein specified shall be adjudged piracy, or shall be liable to the same mode of trial and degree of punishment." 1 Wooddes. 140. T.

* Edicts of the 27th of July 1627, and 26th of April 1653.

† Edict of the 29th of January 1658.

‡ By the law of the United States, "any citizen accepting or exercising within the American territory, a commission from a foreign prince, shall be fined not exceeding two thousand dollars, and imprisoned not exceeding three years; and any person who, in the United States, shall fit or attempt to fit out or be concerned in a privateer, with intent to commit hostilities against a foreign state, with whom the United States are at peace, or shall deliver a (foreign) commission for any ship or vessel to be employed as aforesaid, shall be fined not exceeding five thousand dollars, imprisoned not exceeding three years, and the vessel with all her materials shall be forfeited." Act of the 5th of June 1794.—3 Laws U. S. 89. And by a subsequent act, "if any citizen of the United States shall, without the limits of the same, fit out or procure to be fitted out, or knowingly be concerned in the fitting out of a privateer for the purpose of cruising against the subjects of a nation in amity with us, or shall take the command, or serve on board of such privateer, or purchase any interest in her, he shall be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding ten years." Act of the 4th of June 1797.—4 Laws U. S. 3. T.

§ Sir Leoline Jenkins considers those who commit depredations under several commissions from different sovereigns, as pirates in the highest degree. "The law," says he, "distinguishes between a pirate who is a highwayman, and sets up for robbing, either having no commission at all, or else hath two or three, and a lawful man of war that exceeds his commis account of those who, in the month of November 1657, committed depredations under double commissions from France and Portugal,* of whom I have read in the newspapers of that time.

But what shall we say of those who make use of double passports or sea-letters, as is frequently done by masters of vessels, in order to carry on a contraband trade, or to commit other frauds with greater safety? They, indeed, are not equally guilty with pirates; yet, the states-general, by their edicts of the 31st of December 1657, have ordered the confiscation of their ships and goods. Certain sophistical lawyers† have pretended to argue, that such an act does no injury to us, if it is not done in fraud of our own laws; but this is a weak and silly argument, for it is important to the world at large, sion. 2 L. Jenk. 714. There may be a difference, however, if the commissions are from sovereigns in alliance with each other; but although in such a case it might not amount to the crime of piracy, still it would be irregular and illegal, because the two belligerents might have adopted different rules of conduct with respect to neutrals, or may be separately bound by engagements unknown to the party. Regularly, no one ought to accept of a commission from a foreign prince, without the permission of his own sovereign.

On this subject, we know, that there have been various opinions. The chevalier de Abreu, (a Spaniard), in his Treatise on Captures, first published at Cadiz, in 1756, and lately at Paris, in a French translation, in 1802—thinks, that there can be no inconvenience in taking several commissions from different sovereigns allied in the same war, because they all tend to the same end, the destruction of the common enemy. Abreu, part 2. c. 1. § 7.—but we cannot agree with him on this point, because we think, that it does not belong to an individual to judge of the relations that may exist between different sovereigns, and on his single responsibility to run the risk of involving his own country into a war. Louis XIV. in his Ordonnance de la Marine of 1681, expressly forbids his subjects and all persons residing in France, to take commissions from other sovereigns, without distinguishing whether his allies or not, under the penalty of being punished as pirates. Ord. tit. des Prises, art. 3. Valin, for various excellent reasons, thinks, that independent of positive law, the taking of several commissions even from allied sovereigns, cannot be justified, and strongly combats the opinion of the chevalier de Abreu. 2 Val. Comment. 236. T.

that good faith should be preserved between sovereigns and their subjects, and that the latter should not be permitted to injure the former, by their fraudulent conduct.*

There are also others, who, although they are not properly called pirates, yet on account of the atrocity of their crimes, are punished as such. It is so with those hostile ships who come too near our shores, in violation of the prohibition of the sovereign. On the 24th of February 1696, the states-general issued an edict, by which it was enacted, “that all French privateers which should come close to the land, within the buoys, a fleet not being at hand to protect them, should be capitally punished, and this law was actually carried into execution, at Groningen, on the 14th of March of the same year. By what right such things are done, I have discussed in a former chapter.† Those also by our laws are punished as pirates, who commit frauds in matters of insurance,‡ and likewise those who cut the nets which are spread out for the herring fishery.§

Albericus Gentilis,|| and several other writers are of opinion, that those nations of Africa, whom we call Barbarians, are to be considered as pirates, and that captures made by them, work no change of property; but that opinion cannot be defended on any rational principle. The Algerines, Tripolitans, Tunisians, and those of Salee, are not pirates, but regularly organized societies, who have a fixed territory and an established government, with whom we are now at peace and now at war, as with other nations, and who, therefore, are entitled to the same rights as other independent states. The sovereigns of Europe often enter into treaties with them, and the states-general have done it in several instances.* Cicero defines a regular enemy "one who hath a commonwealth, a court of justice, a treasury, the consent and agreement of the citizens, and who pays some regard to treaties of peace and alliance.† All these things are to be found among the Barbarians of Africa, for they pay the same regard to treaties of peace and alliance that other nations do, who generally attend more to their convenience than to their engagements. And if they should not observe the faith of treaties with the most scrupulous respect, it cannot be well required of them; for, it would be required in vain of other sovereigns. Nay, if they should even act with more injustice than other nations do, they should not on that account, as Huberus‡ very properly observes, lose the rights and privileges of sovereign states.

* In England and in the United States, the rule is, that the courts take no notice of the revenue laws of other countries; and therefore, insurances made on goods or voyages prohibited abroad are supported when not contrary to the stipulations of the parties. *Planché v. It is not mentioned in the Curia Philipica, nor inserted with the other maritime ordinances of the same sovereign, in Les Us & Coutumes de la Mer, nor in Adriaan Verwer's collection of Spanish and Dutch maritime laws, entitled “Over de Zee-Rechten.” T.

Indeed, as the Algerines constitute a republic, ambassadors are sent to them by other princes, and those who are made prisoners by them, change their condition and become slaves.§ Perhaps the Spaniards do not reckon those Barbarians among the number of regular enemies; but, although it may be correct, as to them, the principle will not bear to be extended beyond Spain. The Dutch, it is true, are in the habit of carrying their Algerine prisoners into Spain, and there by the lex talionis, to sell them into slavery, but this is conformable to the law of war, which may be carried into execution against § Hence, those who are taken by the Algerines are not only privately, but sometimes publicly, redeemed. The states-general, on the 25th of September 1681, ordained, that the bailiffs of towns should report to the magistrates those of their inhabitants who should be taken by the Algerines, and that the magistrates should report to the counsellors of the states of Holland. That they might take measures to effect the redemption of the captives.

an enemy, if one thinks proper, under such circumstances as I have above discussed in the third chapter.

There has been a case, however, in which those Africans have been considered to a certain degree as pirates, so far, at least, that their capture was not thought to have worked any change of property. On the 15th of July 1664, the admiralty of Amsterdam restored, without salvage, a vessel which the Algerines had taken from the English, and which the Dutch admiral had recaptured from the Algerines, and the said vessel was so restored, as Aitzema relates,* at the request of the English ambassador, in hopes that the English would do the same by us in similar cases. But lest this case should be drawn into a precedent, it ought to be known, that the Algerines had taken that vessel in the midst of a peace which had been lately concluded by them with the English and Dutch, and for that reason alone it had been considered that their capture under such circumstances, had worked no change of property. Such, according to Aitzema, was the reason given by the English ambassador; whether it was sufficient or not, I shall not now consider, being satisfied with observing, that this ought to be, and in fact it was considered by both parties at the time, as a singular case.

What is the proper forum or jurisdiction for the trial of pirates may be and has often been questioned?† If such a one, although a foreigner, should commit depredations upon our citizens,‡ and be taken, I have no doubt but that he may

‡ As the law of nations is at present understood, it is of no importance, for the purpose of giving jurisdiction, on whom or where the piratical offence has been committed. A pirate is considered as an enemy of the human race, (hostis humani generis;) and therefore, may be tried, convicted and punished in any country where he may be found. "Every man," says sir Leoline Jenkins, "by the usage of our European nations, is justiciable in the place where the crime is committed; so are pirates: being reputed out of the protection of all laws and privileges, and to be tried in what ports soever they may be taken. 2 *L. properly be tried and punished by our own tribunals, not only if he is taken in the fact and brought into our country, but also if he should be found and taken among us on any other occasion. This must be admitted, if he has committed depredations upon us without any commission from his sovereign, but if he had a commission, and it is only alleged that he exceeded it, then the question becomes more susceptible of doubt.

In the year 1667, this subject was agitated between the *English and the states-general, concerning those who had obtained letters of reprisal while there were differences sub-

* The English, however, a few years afterwards, unjustly, in our opinion, claimed and exercised the right of trying and punishing a regularly commissioned privateer for having exceeded the bounds of his commission. The case is related by sir Leoline Jenkins, whose advice was taken and followed on the occasion. In the year 1675, one Cheline, the commander of a French privateer, having committed several unwarrantable depredations at sea, and among other things, plundered several English vessels of their provisions, (England being at that time in amity with France), went with his ship into the port of Kinsale, in Ireland, where his crew having informed against him, sir Leoline Jenkins was consulted by the king on his case, and gave it as his opinion, that he was liable to be punished with death as a pirate, and that his goods and vessel should be confiscated. Cheline, however, having had wind of the intended prosecution, escaped from Ireland, but his vessel and goods were seized, proceeded against in the court of admiralty and confiscated. In vain the king of France, whose commission he bore, demanded that the cause should be remitted to him for trial; sir Leoline answered, that this matter of renvoy (remitting of causes to foreign sovereigns for trial) was quite disused among princes; and as to Cheline's commission, he said, that it had only been given to him to cruise against the enemies of the most christian king, and did not give him the right of pillaging the king's friends. 2 L. Jenk. 714. 754.—Mr. Wooddeson is mistaken, when he says, that Cheline was held not to be punishable for piracy, because he had a commission from the king of France. 2 Wooddes. 425. He was actually punished as a pirate as far as the confiscation of his ship and goods, and if his person had been laid hold of, would have been hanged as such, for plundering the English vessels at sea. It is true, that among the charges exhibited against him, there was one for attacking and taking a Dutch ship, near the port of Dublin, and that on this particular charge, sir L. Jenkins gave it as his opinion, that he could not be capitally convicted; but it was not on the ground of his being bearer of a French commission, but because the statute had provided a different punishment. 2 L. Jenk. 754.

sisting between the two nations, and who committed depredations even after the peace. The English contended, that they were to be tried by the courts of the sovereign who had granted the letters of reprisal. The ambassadors of the states-general insisted, that those who committed hostilities without a lawful authority from their sovereign, were to be considered as pirates, that such was the general law of nations, and that offenders of that description might be punished by any sovereign into whose dominions they might be brought, of which there was a great number of examples. The French ambassadors at that time were of the same opinion in which the English and the states-general then concurred.*

But whether one be a pirate or not, depends upon the fact, whether he has or not, a commission to cruise; and if it should be alleged that he exceeded the authority which that commission gave him, I would not, on that account, hold him to be a pirate. Generally, the sovereigns who grant the commissions, decide on the captures that are made by virtue thereof, because the prizes are brought within their dominions;† but I would have no objection to such decision being made by the sovereign whose subjects complain of depredation, if the perpetrators should be brought or apprehended within his territory.‡ By † Professor Rutherford, in his Institutes of Natural Law, gives a different reason for allowing to the sovereign of the captors, the exclusive right of adjudicating prizes made under his authority. "It is not," says he, "because the prize has been brought into the territory of that sovereign, that he is entitled to an exclusive jurisdiction in such cases; for, the controversy arose upon the main ocean, which is out of his territory, and as he had no jurisdiction in the first instance, the subsequent act of bringing the prize into his territory will not give him any. But the reason is, that the state to which the captors belong has a right to inspect into their behaviour; both because they are members of it, and because it is answerable to all other states for what they do in war." 2 Ruth. 595, 596. Cambridge edit.

* Aitz. l. 47.

‡ Several plausible schemes have been proposed for establishing a more impartial jurisdiction for the trial of neutral property taken in war, but none of them has yet obtained the general assent of mankind, or has even been adopted by a single nation. Hubner is for a mixed tribunal, to consist of commissioners respectively appointed by the sovereigns of the captors and the captured, with the addition, when the prize is carried into a neutral port, of one or more judges appointed by the sovereign of the neutral ter-the 22d article of the treaty of peace between the king of France and the states-general, of the 27th of April 1662, it is stipulated, "that vessels which shall be taken by ships of war or commissioned privateers, shall be tried in the dominions of the sovereign by whom the commission shall have been granted, and not elsewhere."

It is more difficult to decide, whether a foreigner who has committed depredations on other foreigners, may, if he should be found among us, be tried by our tribunals? In the year 1661, doubts were entertained upon this subject, in the case of a Portuguese privateer who had committed depredations on the subjects of a nation in amity with us and not at war with Portugal, but the spoliator having died in the meanwhile, nothing was decided upon it.* In the year 1668, the king of England, on the representation of the ambassadors of the states-general, ordered an Ostend ship, cruising under a comritory. 2 Hubr. 44.—Galiani is for vesting that jurisdiction, in some cases, in the tribunals of the captor, and in others in those of the captured. De' doveri, &c. l. 1. c. 9. § 8, but the ancient practice has continued and still continues to be followed.

It is true, however, that when prizes are brought into a neutral port, the neutral sovereign will restore the property of its subjects or citizens, if it has been illegally captured. That this doctrine is not new, appears clearly from the 15th article of the marine ordinance of Louis the XIV. title des Prises, which contains this express clause: "If on board of the prizes which shall be brought into our ports by foreign armed vessels, there shall be found goods belonging to our subjects or allies, those of our subjects shall be restored to them," and this right, says Valin, "is exercised by way of compensation for the asylum, granted to the captor and his prize." 2 Valin's Comment. 274.

The same right has been exercised by the courts of the United States, in various instances, during the last war between Great-Britain and France. Glass & Gibbs v. The Betsy. 2 Dallas's Reports 6.—Hollingsworth v. The Betsy. 2 Peters's Admiralty Reports, 330.

In like manner, prizes taken by foreign privateers fitted out in the United States, in violation of our neutrality, and brought into our ports, have been invariably restored. Talbot v. Fansen. 2 Dallas, 133. and by an act of congress of the 5th of June 1794, the district courts are authorized "to take cognizance of complaints, by whomsoever instituted, in case of captures made within the waters of the United States, or within a marine league of the coasts or shores thereof." 3 Laws U. S. 91. T.

mission from the king of Spain, which had taken a Dutch vessel, to be detained, and the laws to be executed upon the captain.*

It is clear, that if the law of the neutral country (like the two edicts which I have mentioned above)† forbid the selling of prizes on the neutral territory, unless they have been carried into the port where the privateer was fitted out, and there legally condemned, it will appear unjust to give an action against the captor, either to the government for the punishment of the offence, or to the owners of the captured property for the damage suffered. The condition of both foreigners ought to be alike; if the spoliated party is permitted to bring his action against the captor, the latter ought to be allowed to justify himself, by shewing that his prize was legally captured. And yet, it would be hard and unexampled, to deny to the owner of the captured ship and goods, the right of claiming satisfaction from a foreigner whom he finds here, and who may be immediately going nobody knows whither. For this reason, I am not satisfied with the two edicts above mentioned.

* The fact, as related by Aitzema, (l. 48.) is as follows: The Dutch ambassadors complained to his majesty of the intolerable insolence of the Ostend privateers, and expressed their opinion of the manner in which it should be proceeded against them; they spoke in particular of the ship Jupiter of Amsterdam, which those corsairs had shot at for a long time, (making them believe that they were Turks), and had frightened them so much, that the crew of the Jupiter had forsaken her, and made their escape to the shore, and the privateer had run in with the ship into the Isle of Wight.

The king was pleased to answer, that he had heard great complaints on all sides of the conduct of the Ostend privateers; that they were, in fact, mere pirates, but that he would put a stop to it; that if any of his subjects should be found on board of such privateers, they should be hanged, and that he would make strong representations to the court of Brussels, that they should inflict the severest penalties upon such robbers; that with regard to the ship Jupiter, the ambassadors should present a memorial to the council of state, who would take order upon the subject. "The memorial," continues Aitzema, "was accordingly presented, on which his majesty was pleased to resolve, that the captain of the privateer and his ship should be arrested, and proceeded against according to law." 6 Aitz. 395. fol. edit. What was afterwards done with them, does not appear. T.

† C. 15. p. 121.

The common punishment of pirates is the forfeiture of their lives and goods, which is sufficiently pointed out by all the edicts which I have above related, made on the subject of those, who, from the atrocity of their crimes, are to be considered as such. But there is a special edict of the states-general, of the 25th of August 1611, against pirates, properly so called, their aiders and abettors, by which they are punished with the forfeiture of life and goods, one third of the goods being given to the informer. The penalty, therefore, is capital, and it is not in the power of the judges to mitigate the punishment: They do, however, execute the law with more or less rigour, on account of the frequency of piracies and other offences of the like nature. And, indeed, provided death is inflicted, the remainder may be left to the discretion of the judge, as is the case with almost all other crimes, for which the law in general terms directs a capital punishment.*

* If we have not mistaken the meaning of this passage, it seems that the mode of inflicting the punishment of death, when the law had not expressly provided it, was formerly left, in Holland, to the discretion of the judges. We wish that we may have misunderstood it. T.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Of Privateers.

THIS subject also properly belongs to the law of nations, not only because privateering cannot be lawfully carried on without an authorization from the government, but because the controversies which arise out of it, often create disturbance within the state, and set sovereigns at variance with each other.

It was formerly held at Rome, that one who was not regularly enrolled as a soldier, could not lawfully kill an enemy of the Roman people. Such was the opinion of Cato, as we are informed by *Cicero and Plutarch.† But it appears from the Digest,‡ that the law of Solon,§ by which individuals were permitted to form associations for the purpose of plunder, was afterwards introduced into the Roman system of laws, and made a part of their code.||

‡ ff. de Colleg. & Corpor. l. 4.

§ Among the ancient Greeks and Romans, down to the time of Tarquin, it was considered as glorious, to plunder foreigners at sea, with whom there were no treaties of peace or alliance, even though there was no public or open war against them. Grot. De Jure B. ac P. l. 2. c. 15. § 5.—Justin. l. 43. c. 3. It seems, that the manners of those nations at that time were very similar in this respect to those of the barbarians of Africa at the present day, who plunder indiscriminately all those with whom they have not, by an express treaty, agreed to remain at peace. T.

|| But in the Latin translation which is subjoined in the Digest to the Greek text of Solon, the words of the original ἐπι λίαν ὀρχόμενοι, (those who go out for plunder) are not translated, and the compilers have inserted in lieu thereof, sodales qui multum simul habitantes sunt, (associates who live a great deal together.) This difference has very much exercised the ingenuity of the doctors of the civil law, to whose works we shall refer those of our

It is now, indeed, a long time since sovereigns have begun to make use of the aid of individuals against their enemies, as auxiliary to the public force. Formerly, in the United Netherlands, there were no vessels of war but such as were owned by private persons, to whom, besides bounties out of the captured and recaptured property, the state paid a certain sum, by way of indemnity from the public treasury, proportioned to the expense which they were at, and to the time which they employed in hostile expeditions. A great use was made of those private armed vessels (which were then called cruisers) by the states-general, in their war with Spain. Several edicts were made respecting them, which it is needless to relate.

At present, as well as formerly, when war takes place, vessels are fitted out, manned and armed by private adventurers at their own expense, with which they attack the enemy's vessels at sea, with no other inducement than that of the captures which they expect to make. These have been called capers and freebooters, but now by a more decent appellation are denominated privateers. It is not possible to ascertain whether they were the same description of men, who, in the Digest, are called latrunculi.* For my part, I do not believe it, nor do I think that Albericus Gentilis is right in giving them the name of pirates, which he does throughout his work De Advocatione Hispanicâ, whenever he has occasion to speak of them, and even when he treats of the laws and usages by which their conduct is regulated. This is so very absurd, that it does not deserve a serious refutation; for, after all, what those men do, is done under the sanction of public authority. In this country they are not allowed to sail without a commission from the states-general or the admiral, countersigned by the lieutenant of the admiralty of their particular district, nor without having first made oath and given satisfactory security that they will not do any injury to neutrals. These and other regulations are to be found in the Formæ Admiralitatum,† and in various edicts, which have been made on the subject of privateers whenever foreign powers have complained of their depredations. But as those edicts are in every body's hands, I think it unnecessary to give here a more particular account of the regulations which they contain.

I think it more worth while to inquire whether the captains of privateer ships, who are not themselves the owners of the vessels, may enter into a partnership with each other for sharing in the prizes which they may each separately take? If they are sent out merely to cruise and make captures, and have no further authority, it is certain that they cannot form such partnerships without the consent of their owners, otherwise, the agreements which they make with each other are to be considered as null and void.

Let it not be objected,* that by the law of Solon above-mentioned, the partnership contracts of those who go out to plunder are declared valid, for it is sufficiently clear, that the legislator only meant to speak of those who are their own masters, and go out to plunder on their own account. So, if the owners of privateers should enter into partnerships with each other, and agree that their prizes should be equally divided among themselves, such agreements as well as every other which they might make, would undoubtedly be valid; because every one may dispose of his own property as he thinks fit: but such a power can never be exercised by captains of private armed ships, unless they are also the owners of them, which is hardly ever the case.

We are speaking here only of those captains of privateers who have received an authority from their owners merely to cruise, and who exceed it by entering into particular agreements with each other. There was once a cause of very great moment decided upon this question, and which was even carried to the court of revision. Two privateers, one belonging to A and the other to B took a vessel together, and afterwards (as B alleged) the two captains agreed together, that any future prize that they should make, should be divided between them. Afterwards they separated, and A's vessel alone took another prize, which B insisted should be divided between them, by virtue of their agreement. A denied that the agreement extended to prizes separately made, and if it did, he contended, that it was illegal and void. And so it was determined by the inferior court at Flushing. But B having appealed to the supreme court, the cause was decided in his favour, on the 3d of March 1696, and that judgment was affirmed by the court of review on the 4th of October 1697. To the same effect is the opinion of several advocates in Consilia Belgica,* and a similar decision was given by the court of admiralty of Amsterdam, in 1665.

But all these decisions, except that of the court of Flushing, appear to me to have been erroneous, and I think that the cause ought to have been determined in favour of A. I have read with astonishment in the acts of the supreme court, in which the opinions of several judges of that tribunal and of the court of review are inserted, that in the particular case that I have spoken of, the only question that was agitated was, whether there had actually been an agreement between the two captains, that the prizes which they should separately take should be common between them, or whether it contemplated merely those which they should take in company; but the question of the legality of the agreement, which was the first that suggested itself to me, does not appear to have been even thought of.

Admitting that it had been expressly agreed between the two captains, that all the prizes which they or either of them should take, whether jointly or separately, should be equally or proportionably divided between them, still I do not think that A was at all bound by that agreement. He had sent out his vessel at his own risk, for the sole purpose of cruising and making captures; he had given no other instructions to his captain, and had in no manner authorized him to enter into partnership with others, which he might have done himself, if he had thought proper. His captain, therefore, had no authority for what he did, and in that case, his unauthorized act could not bind his owner. I know, that if B's vessel had alone made a prize, it would not have been difficult to persuade A to receive his proportion of it; but neither would it have been difficult to persuade B to contend for the same principle, which A in the case before us, insisted upon. The first vessel which was taken by the two armed ships together, and by means of their joint force, was a prize common to them both, by an implied partnership arising out of the circumstances of the case; but it was not so with the second, which A's vessel took alone, and which he ought to have kept exclusively to himself, if, agreeably to my opinion, he was not bound by the agreement of his captain. Therefore, on legal principles, setting aside the question of fact, I prefer the decision of the court of Flushing to all the others that have been given on the same subject.

I proceed to a question, which, in my opinion, deserves the most serious consideration; it is, "Whether, if one or more armed ships take a prize, others being present, but not fighting, it is to be divided between them?" As far as relates to ships of war, this question is settled by positive law; for, there is a decree of the states-general, of the 28th of January 1631, by which it is enacted, "That if a ship of war shall attack an enemy, another ship of war being present, may join in the fight, but not if the one who attacked first, shall call out that he has no need of assistance." But it appears to me, that this law was made specially for vessels of war, otherwise, there is nothing to hinder one armed vessel from joining another, in attacking and capturing a common enemy who is not yet subdued.

For the same reason I consider as a special ordinance, the sixth section of the Forma or regulation of the 15th of July 1633, expressly made for the privateers commissioned to cruise against the Spaniards in America, by which it was ordered, "that a privateer who should take a prize jointly with a vessel of the West-India Company, should not be entitled to a share thereof, unless he had been expressly called to the assistance of the company's ship." The same may be said of the seventh section, which enjoins upon all privateers, on pain of forfeiture of ship and goods, "not to meddle or interfere with the captures which the ships of the company may wish to make." If, however, the aid of a privateer ship should be called for, and she should take a prize, jointly with a vessel of the West-India Company, there is no doubt but that it should be distributed between them, in proportion to their respective size and force, as is provided by the sixth section of the said Forma: and if their force is equal, then the prize is to be equally divided between them; otherwise, it is best to observe what is called a geometrical proportion.

What shall we say, if one or more ships pursue an enemy's vessel, and one of them perishes? or if more, perhaps; are present, but one alone takes the prize, while the others are merely spectators, and take no part in the action? The decree of the 28th of January 1631, which I have mentioned above, directs, that in such a case, "the prize is to be divided between all the vessels of war which have pursued her, but that she which has actually made the capture is to have the provisions, small-arms and plunderage."* But this again only concerns ships of war, of whose captures the states-general dispose at their discretion; for otherwise, if the case concerned privateers only, I would rather adjudge the whole prize to him who has fought and conquered the enemy's vessel, how many others soever might have pursued her, or been spectators of the contest.†

* The precise expression used in the original: it probably means every thing susceptible of being made booty of war, which is not a part of the vessel or of her cargo, (properly so called.) 7.

† This opinion of our author accords with that of the modern writers who have treated of this particular subject. "Excepting," says professor Martens, "the case of an association among privateers, it is requisite, in order to have a share in the prize, to prove the having contributed in some manner to the taking of it, and it is not sufficient to have been found in sight." Martens on Captures, § 32. in fn. p. 91. Engl. transl. It appears also to be, as far as we know, generally carried into practice among the nations

There are those, I know, who are for admitting all who were merely present, or even in sight, though at a distance; but this cannot be admitted. It is true, that the mere presence of Europe, with respect to privateers, though in the case of vessels of war, governments have been induced, from motives of policy, to adopt a different rule.

The ordinances of France provide, that with regard to vessels of war, "those shall be considered as joint captors who shall have found themselves together and in sight of the capture at the time of its being made. Ord. of the 15th of June 1757, art. 10. 1 Code des Prises, (edit. 1784) p. 512. —Valin, Traité des Prises, Append. 199. Thus, the mere circumstance of being in sight at the time of the capture, entitles a ship of war, by virtue of this ordinance, to a share of the prize.

But, in the case of privateers, another ordinance prescribes the opposite rule. It enacts, "that none shall be entitled to a share in a prize taken from the enemy, who have not contributed to the taking of the vessel;" which the next article explains, can only be done "by fighting, or by making such an effort as may have compelled the enemy to surrender, by intimidating him or cutting off his retreat." Ord. of the 27th January 1706, art. 1 and 2. 1 Code des Prises, 282. (same edition.)—Valin, ubi supra, p. 102.

In England, the same distinction appears to be adopted. Ships of war are entitled to share in a prize from the mere circumstance of having been in sight at the time of the capture, the ancient general rule having been relaxed or modified in their favour. "Formerly," says sir William Scott, "joint capture was confined to cases of actual co-operation, and when, in consequence of frequent litigations, it was extended to constructive assistance, for the purpose of preserving harmony and good understanding among the navy, the being in sight became the principal criterion. The Vryheid, 2 Rob. 14. Am. edit.—In a later case, the same judge determined, in a contest between a king's ship and a privateer, that the mere being in sight was sufficient in the former to support the animus capiendi, and entitle her to a share of the prize. The Flore, 5 Rob. 239. Am. edit.

But, on the contrary, when a similar controversy arose between similar parties, and the privateer claimed a share of the king's ship's prize, because he had been present at the capture, sir William Scott decided, "that the mere being in sight was not sufficient, with respect to privateers, to raise the presumption of co-operation in the capture: they clothe themselves, said he, with commissions of war from views of private advantage only; they are not bound to put their commissions in use on every discovery of an enemy, and therefore, the law does not presume in their favour, from the mere circumstance of being in sight, that they were there with a design of contributing assistance and engaging in the contest." L'Amitié, 6 Rob. 264. Am. edit.

We have not been able to find a single case in any of Dr. Robinson's Reports, in which the naked question has been agitated exclusively of others may have been the cause that the enemy has either surrendered sooner or been more easily subdued; but we are not to consider for what reason the vessel was taken or surrendered, but who took her. In the same manner, we should not admit the fort,* town or fleet in whose presence a capture was made, to a participation in the prize, even though it might be said to have been induced to surrender, by the fear which their presence excited. On the other hand, it is clear, that if another vessel has joined the captor in fighting the enemy, an accidental partnership must be considered as having taken place between them, and the reason of the thing requires, that what has been taken by their joint efforts, should be divided among them in proportion to their respective strength. Nor are we to discriminate in such a case between the different degrees of exertion; for that would be too difficult in practice; but we only consider whether the vessel which was present at the capture, did actually fight, and by her assistance, contribute to the victory.

Analogous to this principle is the doctrine which the civil law lays down on the subject of animals feræ naturæ, which do not become the property of those who pursue, but of those who actually take them.†

between privateers. In one case, indeed, a share in a prize was allowed to one of that description in competition with another, from the circumstance of his being in sight at the time of the capture, coupled with that of having sailed in company with the principal captor, and the capture was that of a defenceless neutral vessel, in which no fighting was required: The William & Mary, 4 Rob. 312. Am. edit. But we have not discovered one in which the question turned singly on the circumstance of being in sight, at the time of the capture; therefore, we presume, that the principles established in L'Amitié, would prevail in such a case. T.

* In England, land forces are not considered as entitled to share in a capture, unless they have actually assisted and co-operated in it. The Dordrecht, 2 Rob. 53. Am. edit. T.

CHAPTER XIX.

Of the Responsibility of owners of Privateers.

BY the laws of our country, contained in the Formæ Admiralitatum and several edicts of the states-general, privateers are not permitted to sail from our ports, without giving security to answer for their good behaviour, that they will do no injury to neutrals, and that they will bring their prizes to legal adjudication, by the court of admiralty of the place where the security is given.*

The amount of this security has varied. It was at first required to be in ten thousand florins, the ship and the cargo at the same time remaining answerable for the consequences of the privateer's unlawful conduct. Afterwards it was ordered, that the owner should give security in twelve thousand, and the captain in ten thousand florins, the owner's bond to be resorted to in the first instance, and if it should not prove sufficient, then recourse might be had to that given by the captain.† But by the last edict which has been made upon this subject,‡ it is merely provided, that security shall be given in the sum of thirty thousand florins,§ and the law does not specify, whether by the captain or by the owners. It appears to me, however, that the captain is the person who is to give the security, because it is he who is to bring the prize into the port from whence the vessel has sailed. I might mention here several treaties between the states-general and other powers, by which it has been stipulated, that captains and owners of privateers should give security not to do any thing in violation of existing treaties, but as they do not enter into further details, I think that I may safely pass them over.

Thus much being premised, I shall proceed to inquire, whether, if a privateer has made an illegal capture, the damage suffered in consequence thereof is to be repaired by the captain, his securities, or the owners of the capturing vessel, and if to the latter, then to what extent they are liable? On this question, the Dutch lawyers have answered,* “that if the captain of a privateer ship has wrongfully taken a neutral vessel, and she should be lost in consequence of his having put an ignorant prizemaster on board of her, the party injured may sue, at his pleasure, the owner of the privateer, the captain, his securities and every one of them, until he recovers the whole amount of the damage, even though it should by far exceed the value of the vessel that made the capture.” Let us now consider this subject in detail.

A doubt cannot be entertained of the liability of the captain to the whole extent of the damage suffered in consequence of his unlawful capture. He was employed for the purpose of capturing enemies, not neutrals; if, therefore, he has made prize of the latter, he has exceeded his authority, and is consequently liable for all the damage which the neutral has suffered. This principle is clearly sanctioned by the edict of the states-general, of the 1st of April 1622; for, after teers were directed to give security in §14,000, if the vessel carried more than 150 men, and in half that sum if she carried less. Act of the 9th of July 1798, § 4.—4 Laws U. S. 165.

In Spain, however, according to their prize ordinances of 1779 and 1796, (we have not seen that which was probably made at the beginning of the present war), security is only required from all privateers, without distinction, in 3000 rials de vellon, equal to §1500. T.

* Consil. Belg. vol. 4. Consil 205.

directing that security shall be given by the captains of privateers, in the sum of ten thousand florins, that they shall bring their prizes into the port from which they shall have sailed, the law proceeds and says: "reserving, nevertheless, to those who shall have suffered damage by any unlawful act committed by the captain beyond the extent of his commission, their personal action against the said captain and others who shall have occasioned the said damage."

As to the securities, the advocates who subscribed the opinion above mentioned, appear to me to have been mistaken; for, those securities cannot, I think, be made responsible for the whole damage suffered, unless they have bound themselves to that extent; but if they have merely stipulated in a certain fixed sum, as is usual in such cases, they cannot be made liable beyond its amount, nor can they be called upon to answer for any other acts than those for which they have expressly made themselves responsible; as for instance, if they have become bound for the carrying of the prizes into a particular port, and the prizes have been actually carried thither, I conceive that they are discharged, and that it is nothing to them, whether the captures have been lawfully or unlawfully made, unless they have bound themselves for that likewise. But because captains of privateers are in general so poor, that they are not able to make good the damage which they have occasioned, and because the securities are not in general bound beyond a certain sum, which, after being compelled to pay, they may recover back by an action against the owners, it is upon the owners that the whole burthen falls in the end. Let us, therefore, as to them, inquire in the first place, whether they are liable for the whole of the damage suffered, or whether, as in the actio de pauperie and actio noxalis,* they are only bound to the amount of the value of the privateer and her appurtenances?

* The first of these actions was given by the Roman law against the owner of a quadruped, which had done an injury to some person, by kicking, biting, &c. which was called pauperiem facere. See on this subject, the title of the Digest, si quadrupes pauperiem fecisse dicatur. Dig. l. 9. tit. 1.

The actio noxalis lay against the master of a slave for a theft or other injury done or committed by him. Dig. l. 9. tit. 4. De noxalibus actionibus.

In both these cases, the owner or master was discharged by delivering up the quadruped or the slave.

A question of this kind was formerly brought before the supreme court of Holland. Five Dutch privateers had unlawfully taken a Venetian ship. The owners of the captured vessel at first instituted a suit against the captains of the privateers, and obtained a judgment, by which they were condemned to restore the vessel only, without damages. But as the sentence was not complied with, they then brought an action against the five owners, contending, that they should jointly and severally be condemned not only to restore the vessel, but also to pay damages. The court, by their decree of the 31st of July 1603, condemned the owners jointly and severally, to restore the vessel and her cargo, and if that could not be done, then to pay their appraised value; but the sentence contained an express clause, that execution of it should be made only on the five ships which had made the capture, and that the owners should not be bound beyond their proceeds.

On the strength of this precedent, respectable lawyers have given their opinion to the same effect,* but I cannot concur with them, because I think, that when the owners of a privateer ship put a captain on board of her to make captures, they are bound for the whole of the damage that he may occasion. The master who captures, in consequence of an authority that he has received, is appointed for that particular purpose, and he who appointed him, is by that alone, responsible for every thing, good or bad, that he may do in the execution of his trust. Thus we give the actio institoria† against the proprietor of an inn, who has appointed an innkeeper; if the innkeeper makes any contract, we do not distinguish in what manner or with what intent he did it; and thus also we give the actio exercitoria‡ against the owner of a vessel for the act of the master, provided the latter acted in the course of his employment as such; if otherwise, the owner is not bound, as Ulpian fully demonstrates.* The appointment is the sole cause why the proprietor of the inn and the owner of the vessel are responsible, if what has been done belonged to the business for which the authority was given, and not to some other one, different from it. He who appointed the captain of a privateer must have known, that his business was to make captures, and that if he should execute it improperly, it would be imputed to the owner for having appointed a dishonest or an unskilful captain. If the master having borrowed money for the repairs of his vessel, applies it to his own use, Oflivius tells us very properly, "that the owner is liable and must impute it to himself that he employed such a person."† Wherewith agrees, what the states-general say at the close of their decree of the 22d of October 1627, "that the owners must take care that they employ proper captains."

* Consil. Holland. vol. 3. Consil 221.

If the proprietor of an inn is liable for the acts of the inn-keeper, and the owner of the vessel for those of the master, it clearly follows, that they are so to the amount of their whole property, and that they are not discharged by delivering up the inn or the vessel. I do not remember to have seen this doctrine contradicted any where, nor could it be contradicted with any appearance of reason, for nothing is clearer, than that those who are responsible for the acts of others are so to the whole extent of the damage which they may occasion, and therefore the owners of a privateer are bound to make good in toto, the damage suffered by the illegal spoliations of their captain.

The laws which I have already mentioned, afford strong arguments in favour of this principle. The owners of privateer ships are bound to give security, formerly in twelve thousand, now in thirty thousand florins, that no injury shall be done to an ally or neutral. Now, if they are not personally bound to a farther extent than the value of the vessel, why is a specific sum required which may, in many instances, greatly exceed that value? If the law had meant that the value of the ship should fix the extent of their responsibility, it should have directed her to be valued, and ordered security to be taken in the precise amount of the valuation. A still stronger argument may be drawn from the Forma of the 28th of July 1705; for, by that law the owners themselves are declared to be liable for the damage which may be suffered by the wrongful acts of the privateer ship, and every thing belonging to her equipment is made subject to a special lien or tacit hypothecation to answer for that damage. Away, then, with the doctrines which are drawn from the Roman laws, on the subject of the actio de pauperie and actio noxalis. These do not apply to the present question, and are founded on quite different principles.

* ff. de exercit. act. l. 1. §. 12.

We must therefore conclude, that the supreme court, in the case above mentioned, gave an erroneous sentence; for, if the owners of the privateer ships had appointed the captains who took the Venetian vessels, and had authorized them to make captures, they were bound for the whole, in the same manner as they would have been if they had appointed those captains for mercantile purposes, and had given them authority to make commercial contracts. Perhaps, however, it will be said, that the report does not expressly state, that those five vessels were privateers; but if they were not such, it cannot be said, that the owners gave authority to their captains to make captures, and in that case, I would wish to know, why the court condemned the owners to the restitution of the Venetian ship and cargo, and awarded execution even against the vessels of those owners, and thus condemned them for an act which was not within the authority committed to their captains, which is evidently contrary to the most familiar principles of law. In such a case, therefore, the owners of a vessel cannot be made in any manner liable; for they, indeed, have put the master in their place and stead, but merely as to the business which they have ordered him to transact, and if in the course of that business, the master had committed a fault, or has been guilty of fraud, they are bound to answer for him, otherwise not. If I give to a carpenter a vessel to repair, and he gives it to his apprentice, who, with one of his master's own tools, happens to kill somebody, the master will not be at all answerable for it. Therefore, the action against owners of ships cannot be assimilated to the action de pauperie, except so far as it makes the owner of a horse or mule liable, if by the fault of his driver, the animal has done some damage, but the analogy of that law does not reach farther.

Agreeably to the doctrines which I have contended for, owners of vessels will clearly not be liable, if they have not appointed the master for the purpose of making captures, otherwise they will be responsible, not merely to the amount of the value of their vessels, but to that of their stipulations, which formerly were of 12,000 and now are of 30,000 florins. In addition to that, those who have suffered the damage, may, by virtue of the decree of the 22d of October 1627, sue the security of 10,000 florins, which the captain is obliged to give, that he will bring his prizes into the port from whence he sailed, for so the decree expressly provides. I think, however, that such a demand would be unjust, unless it had been made known to the securities, at the time of their entering into the stipulation, that they would be exposed to that liability, and had agreed to it; for if they had simply engaged, as is almost always the case, that the captain should return with his prizes to the port from whence he sailed, I cannot express how unjust it appears to me, to make them liable on that security for any other cause; as I have already hinted, when speaking on the subject of securities.* But if all that I have mentioned is not sufficient to repair the damage, what shall we say in such a case? Are the owners to be held further? I think that they are, until they shall have made good the whole damage; for, it is clear, that a pledge or security does not liberate a debtor, unless it is fully sufficient to discharge the debt.†

Moreover, if the vessel, which we are speaking of, be not a privateer, that is to say, if she has no commission, but nevertheless makes captures by order of the owners, I think that the same thing is to be said as if she really were a privateer; for, the right arises out of the authority and the appointment, and it is nothing to those who have suffered the damage, whether they are injured by a real privateer or by a vessel not provided with a commission.

CHAPTER XX.

Of Captures made by vessels not commissioned.

IT is properly made a subject of inquiry, whether, if a ship not commissioned to make captures is attacked by an enemy, and in her defence, or from some other justifiable cause, takes an enemy's vessel, to whom in such case the prize is to belong? Three contending parties appear, who seem to have an equal claim to it, and in favour of each of whom many ingenious arguments may be adduced; they are the owner of the ship, the captain and mariners, and the shipper who may have taken her to freight.

On behalf of the owner of the ship, it may be said, that he is entitled to the prize, because it was taken with his own ship and guns, and because the captain and men who effected the capture were in his employ, and bound to labour for his benefit: it ought not to be given to the captain nor to the mariners, because they are not entitled in law to any thing besides their wages, nor to the freighter, because he only hired the vessel for the transportation of his merchandize, and for nothing else.

The master and mariners, however, may plead that the capture was achieved by their prowess and with the danger of their lives, and therefore, that they are justly entitled to the benefit resulting from it: that with respect to the owner of the ship and the freighter, they cannot in justice claim the prize, because they had not hired him to make captures, and the contract which they had made together, was for purposes of a quite different nature.

And lastly, on the part of the freighter, it may be argued, that he had hired the ship, the guns, the master, the mariners, and the right to their labour, not only for the transportation of his merchandize, but also for the defence of the ship for the sake of the goods that it contained, which defence is to be taken with every thing incident to it, and involves the right not merely of repelling, but even of capturing the enemy, to prevent his doing any injury. That on these grounds, he is justly entitled to retain the prize, and it ought by no means to be given to the owner of the ship, his captain or mariners, who all ought to be satisfied with the stipulated reward for the hire of the vessel and their labours.

Such are the arguments which may be made use of in support of each of the above opinions. Before I proceed to state my own, I must premise, that there exists a decree of the board of directors of the West-India company, by which it is provided, "that fifty per cent. of the proceeds of every prize which shall be taken by a vessel hired out on freight, shall be paid to the company." This decree has been sanctioned by the states-general, and inserted in the instructions of the 15th of July 1633, for privateers cruising in the American seas.

It is clear, that the directors, when they made that decree, attended only to the interest of their company, nor had the states-general any thing else in view when they gave it their sanction; for, they made no rule whatever in this respect for other privateers than those above mentioned. It must, therefore, be considered as a special law, made with a view to particular persons and circumstances, and which is not to prejudice other cases to which it is not directly applicable.

As I have never seen a general law upon this subject, nor do I believe that any exists, the question is to be decided by the light of reason alone. On equitable principles, I think that the prize ought to be adjudged to the captain of the capturing vessel and his crew, and not to the owners or freighters. The latter, indeed, are the last who will be thought of. The owner of the ship appears better entitled, but still I would prefer to him the captain and crew. Others, however, have been of a different opinion.*

* In a case of salvage, which bears the strongest analogy to a case of unauthorized capture, (on the supposition that any persons, others than the sovereign of the captor, may be considered as entitled to the prize,) the late

In the year 1667, a ship sailing under a license from the French and Dutch West-India company, which had been granted to the freighters, captured an English vessel within the company's limits. The captors determined to keep the prize with them, though she was a worse sailer than their own vessel, because on consulting together, they agreed, that it was most advisable for the interest of the owners and freighters, as well as their own, that she should be carried into one of the West-India islands, where it was expected she would sell to better advantage. The question then occurred, to whom that prize was to be adjudged? The lawyers who were consulted on that question, decided, that the mariners, because they had been hired at a fixed salary by the month, and had not engaged themselves for shares of prize-money, should only have one tenth of the proceeds, and that the remainder should be equally divided between the owners and freighters.

I do not know upon what principle those gentlemen allowed one tenth to the mariners, nor perhaps did they know themselves. It seems, that they had no difficulty as to the one half of the remainder, which they gave to the owners of the ship; and therefore, they pass it over without assigning any reason for it; but they endeavour to justify, by argument, the allowing of the other half to the freighters. They contend, that it was by virtue of the license which the shippers had obtained from the West-India company, that the vessel was permitted to navigate to the West-Indies, that therefore they contributed, in a considerable degree, to the capture, and ought not to be placed in a worse situation than the owners of the ship. They say, that the mariners did not take the prize for the benefit of the owners of the ship only, but also for that of the owners judge Winchester, district judge of Maryland, allowed one ninth part of the neat salvage to the owners and freighters of the salvor-ship, in proportion to their respective interests, in consideration of the risk to which their property had been exposed. The supreme court of the United States, before whom the cause was ultimately carried by appeal, increased the allowance to one third. The remainder was distributed among those who had been personally instrumental in the salvage. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch's Reports, of the merchandize, and that they declared it themselves, in the resolution which they took; as above mentioned, to carry the prize into one of the West-India islands, for the best advantage of the owners and freighters. To these they add, a variety of other trifling and frivolous arguments; as for instance, that the possession of things is not acquired merely by ourselves, but also by those persons who are employed by us; that the owners of the ship were not present any more than the freighters, when the capture was made, and that if the ship, instead of capturing, had been captured, the owners of the goods on board would have suffered a considerable loss.

But I am not at all convinced by such arguments as these, nor by those which I have mentioned above, in favour of the owners of the capturing ship; for, it is clear, that a prize by whomsoever taken, belongs solely to the captors, unless they acted by the command or under the appointment of another person. The only question, therefore, is, who took the prize? and it is manifest, in this case, that it was the master and mariners, and that they did not do it by the command or direction of another. Their services were, indeed, hired, but for the mere purpose of carrying goods, and for nothing else: Whatever advantage, therefore, may arise from the carrying of the goods, ought to be for the benefit of those who have made use of the agency of others for that purpose; but neither they, nor the owners of the ship are entitled to any share of the prize, because the mariners were not employed to make that capture, but, while they were attending to a business of a quite different nature, to the mere navigation of the vessel, fortune threw something else in their way, fortuna aliud dedit, as Tryphonius elegantly argues, in an analogous case.* For the same reason, in the case of a labourer, who, digging the ground, had found a treasure, I gave it as my opinion, that he was entitled to it.† The condition of the labourer in that, and, for the same reason, of the mariner in the present case, does not extend farther than the business for which they were hired. Whatever is out of it, that is to say, whatever is foreign to the subject of their contract, they are alone to suffer or enjoy, whether it be profit or loss.

* ff. de Acquir. Rer. Dom. l. 63. § 3.

This case clearly comes within the general doctrine of principal and agent. Now, the agent shall certainly not impute to his principal, that he was robbed by highwaymen, lost his property by shipwreck, or that he or his family being taken sick, he had spent a sum of money which had been put into his hands for a particular purpose; for, such occurrences are more properly to be imputed to accident than to the agency, as Paulus justly observes.* Such losses as these follow the person of the agent; while on the other hand, it is natural, as Paulus also very correctly says, that “those gains and advantages which happen by occasion of the agency, should follow it.”† If A has sent B to carry something to C, and B, in the way, has found a sum of money, or has extorted something from a highwayman who attempted to rob him, no one, certainly, whose mind is not very weak, shall think that the money which B has so extorted, belongs to A, although the things which he was sending to C might have been endangered by it. He did not order B to find money, nor to extort any thing from highwaymen, but to carry some articles, which he did carry, and his agency being thus fulfilled, A has nothing more to ask of him.

The arguments of the advocates on the subject of the present question are really trifling. The license which the freighters had obtained from the West-India company could not avail them to make prizes, but only to navigate in the American seas. Nor are we to cavil about the words of the resolution of the mariners above mentioned, when they are susceptible of so many different interpretations. I think that they had no other object in view than to retain the prize with them, to whomsoever it might belong, whether to the owners, the freighters or themselves, or that the words rather signified, that they meant to divide it into three parts, and to give one to each of the said parties. Or perhaps (saving the decree of the board of directors) they might have believed that the prize belonged to them alone; as if the vessel was laden with provisions or other necessaries of life, which they themselves were in need of, and thus might be useful to the owners of the ship and goods, by enabling them to prosecute the voyage, or they might have had various other motives of the same kind. And who will dare to suppose, that those mariners weighed and considered so particularly the words of their resolution, and that if the prize did belong to them, they wished to abandon their claim to the whole of it? Nay, if they had even believed that it did not belong to them, but to the owners and freighters, who would not excuse their simple honesty? He, who, thinking, that what is his own property belongs to another, gives it up to him, is not to suffer by it. Let not an error in point of law, be objected to those good mariners, since, as well from the resolution itself as from other circumstances, it appears that they made no final determination, and it is sufficiently clear, that they never had an intention to give up any right to which they might be entitled. It is true, however, that if they had fought more than was necessary for their defence, and the ship or goods had suffered by it, they would have been bound to an indemnity by the terms of their contract.

On these principles, a cause was formerly decided by the court of Brussels, which I think, bears a strong analogy to the present case: A person had lent a horse to the commandant of a corps of cavalry, to fight with; the court were of opinion, that the lender of the horse was not entitled to a share of the booty which the officer took with it. I fully approve of the legality of this sentence, though it has been doubted by some, and *Zouch refers us to a contrary opinion, given by Petrinus Bellus;† there was, however, in that case, much more equity in favour of awarding a part of the booty to the officer, as it was nothing to him, whether the person to whom he lent his horse, should fight or not. And yet, he had no more right to the prize, than one who lends his net to another, has a right to the fish that he takes with it.

* De Jure Fec. p. 2. § 8. Q. 17.

† De Re Milit. P. 4. tit. 8. n. 8.

It will be said, perhaps, that I am wasting words on an idle and useless question, as it is unlawful to make captures without a commission from the states-general, or the admiral, and so far from the one who takes a prize without such a commission, being entitled to it, he is rather to be considered as a pirate, agreeably to the principles which I have above contended for. But this does not follow in every case. Grotius very properly says,* that “a private capture is acquired to a private captor, and there can be no doubt, that a prize taken under circumstances of necessity, by non-commissioned vessels, belongs to those who have taken it.” I know, that the authority of Puffendorff† is adduced to the contrary, but he does not contradict this doctrine; for he speaks of those, who, without any authority, go out for the express purpose of making captures, not of those, who, being attacked by an enemy, turn upon him in their own defence, and these are the persons that I am speaking of. If, in such a case, it is denied, that it is lawful to take the enemy’s property, it must be denied also, that it is lawful to despoil him, who otherwise will despoil us, and there must be an end to the right of self-defence. And yet, every declaration of war not only permits, but expressly orders all good and loyal subjects, to injure the enemy by every possible means, that is to say, not only to avert the danger with which the enemy threatens you, but to capture‡ and strip him of all his property. The case is different with those who sail out on cruises, without a commission, and without complying with the previous requisites of the law, because they are prohibited from doing so by various edicts of the states-general. But how can he be expected to have a commission, who, sailing merely for the sake of trade, meets an enemy who attacks him, and captures him in his own defence? If Grotius and Puffendorff had explained themselves in this manner, those who now find fault with both, would have had no occasion to do it.*

* In France and Great-Britain, prizes taken by non-commissioned vessels belong to the lord high admiral, as a droit of his office. 1 Valin's Comment. 79.—*British order in council, of the 6th of March 1665-6, in a note to the case of the Rebecca, 1. But, as in Great-Britain the office of high admiral is vested in the king, and has for a long time been executed by commission, suitable rewards are given, at the discretion of the government, in meritorious cases. And we presume, that the government of France is not backward in displaying its liberality on similar occasions. T.

CHAPTER XXI.

Of Insuring enemy's property.

NEXT to the contracts of purchase, sale and hire,* there is none, at present, in more frequent use, in commercial countries, than that of insurance. It was, however, so entirely unknown to the ancients, that no trace of it is to be found in the volumes of Roman jurisprudence. The reason probably is, that commerce was not at that time carried on to the same extent that it is at this day. Perhaps, also, the fleets of the Romans secured their merchant vessels from deprivations at sea, or the vast extent of their empire, bordering on all the seas which their navigators were in the habit of frequenting, dispelled all fears of enemies. Nor was there so much to be feared as there is at present from the dangers of the ocean, as their vessels generally sailed coastwise, prudently keeping within a small distance from the shore, and did not venture out to sea in the winter months,† whereas our ships at present sail out to any distance, and we trust them at all times and in all seasons to the treacherous element, without knowing whither the fates may carry them.

I have read, however, in Suetonius's life of the emperor Claudius, that during a time of great scarcity, when the people abused him, and shewed him, by way of reproach, fragments of stale bread, he not only gave great encouragement to the

* Locatio, hiring or letting to hire. At the civil law, the signification of this word is very extensive; locatio operum, is when a man hires out or engages his labour to another for a specific reward; locatio rerum, is the hiring or letting to hire or farm (as we call it) of property of any kind, whether real, personal or mixed. building of ships, but proposed certain profits to the merchants, taking upon himself the risk of any loss that might be occasioned by the violence of the winds and seas. This was a species of insurance, which is nothing else than an engagement for the safety of another's property, by which the owner is liberated from the risk, which is assumed by the insurer, in consideration of a certain præmium.* Claudius, indeed, assumed upon himself the dangers of the sea, but he did it gratuitously and not for the consideration of a præmium or reward; nor did he undertake to bear the losses which might be suffered from pirates; therefore, I say that it was only a species of insurance.†

I have premised a definition of the contract of insurance, in order to make it appear, that the reason of war absolutely requires the prohibition of insurance on the ships, merchandize or other property of enemies. For, what else is assuming the risk to which their property may be exposed, than promoting their maritime commerce? The object of insurance is, that maritime trade may be carried on with the greatest possible profit, and the least possible loss. Hence, the states-general, on the 1st of April 1622, while we were at war with the Spaniards, issued an edict, annulling all insurances made and to be made by Dutch subjects on Spanish property, and laying a fine of one hundred pounds, Flemish, on all who should act

* The definition, which our author gives of the contract of insurance, is very similar to that which had been given, long before him, by Roccus, which is still the most logical and comprehensive of all that have ever been offered. "Insurance," says that able writer, in the excellent translation of his two treatises, (on ships and freight and on insurance), lately published at Philadelphia, by Mr. J. R. Ingersoll, "is a contract by which a person assumes upon himself the risk to which the property of another may be exposed, and binds himself, in consideration of a certain præmium, to indemnify him in case of loss." Ingersoll's Roccus, p. 85. T.

† For a full and complete view of all that is to be found in the works of the ancients which may be considered as having any relation to the subject of insurance, see Mr. Park's introduction to his System of the Law of Marine Insurances, which is fraught with a great deal of information on this particular subject, from whence Mr. Park justly concludes with our author, that the contract of insurance, as at present understood, was not known to the ancient Greeks and Romans. to the contrary. This was extremely proper, because, in all declarations of war, the subjects are ordered to do as much harm as they can to the enemy, and therefore, it follows, that they are prohibited from doing them any good. Such are the rules prescribed by the general law of war, and the states-general did no more than declare that law during the war with Spain, by their edict of the 2d of April 1559.

It may, perhaps, be said, that such insurances are productive of more profit than loss to the insurers, and therefore, that they are more advantageous to us than to the enemy. But this may prove a very fallacious reasoning, for the result of insurances on enemy's property, is, in a national point of view, very uncertain, nor does experience sufficiently enable us to judge of their effects upon the nation at large; while on the other hand, it is very certain that the enemy thereby acquires the means of extending his maritime commerce. It therefore, follows, that what is certainly useful to our enemy, and almost as certainly threatens our own destruction, is, on every principle, to be prohibited.*

* Trading with enemies, and insurances on enemy's property have been prohibited, from the earliest times, in almost every country of Europe. England and Holland are the only ones that are known to have pursued, for a while, a different policy. The ordinance of Barcelona, made in 1484, expressly forbids such insurances to be made, directly or indirectly, no puxen esser aseguadas directamen o indirectamen. Cleirac, Us & Coutumes de la Mer, p. 118.—Consol. del Mar. (Boucher's Fr. transl.) vol. ii. p. 717. § 1540. Le Guidon, a very old treatise on maritime law, declares it to be unlawful to trade with enemies, and to make insurance on enemy's property, c. 2. art. 5. in Cleirac, p. 117. Mr. Valin mentions several ancient ordinances of France to the same effect, which shew, that the law was always so understood in that country. But he observes that the English, during the seven year's war, were in the habit of insuring the property of the French, even when bound from a French port to a French colony, or from one French port to another. "By this means," says he, "one part of the nation restored to us, by the effects of the contract of insurance, what the other took from us by the law of war." 2 Valin's Comm. p. 32.

It is certain, that in England, not only during that war, but during that which immediately preceded, and that which immediately followed it, that is to say, during a period of near half a century, trading with enemies, and insurances on enemy's property were carried on to a great extent, and were sanctioned by the decisions of the tribunals of that country. In the year 1749, lord Hardwicke considered an insurance as legal, which had been made on an English vessel that had been sent to Ostend, to be neutralized, and from thence to trade with the enemy, under cover of the neutral flag. He said, that "it had never been determined, that insurance on enemy's ships, during the war, was unlawful; and that it might be going too far to say, that all trading with enemies was prohibited by law, for the general doctrine would go a great way, even when English goods were exported, and none of the enemy's imported, which might be very beneficial." Henkle v. Royal Exch. Ass. Comp. 1 Ves. 317.

This reason alone would have been sufficient to justify the said edict of the 1st of April 1622, but it also adverts to a consequence that would follow, if those insurances should be

During the American war, insurances of this description were neither less frequent nor less favoured by the English tribunals. Planché v. Fletcher, was the case of a Swedish ship, laden for French account, and bound directly from London to Nantz, with a simulated destination for the neutral port of Ostend. Doug. 251.—Thellusson v. Ferguson, was an insurance on a French ship, which had sailed under French convoy from a French colony to a port in France. Ib. 361. In both these cases, the property insured had been condemned by the English court of admiralty, but the insurances were, nevertheless, held valid; and thus, the courts of common law sanctioned and encouraged the same acts which the courts of admiralty punished. In the former case, it was objected, that in time of war, the exportation of enemy's property, even in neutral bottoms, was illegal, and that an insurance upon such goods was void; but, lord Mansfield overruled the objection. "It does not appear," said he, "that the goods were French property; an Englishman might be sending his goods in a neutral ship. But it is indifferent whether they were English or French; the risk insured, extends to all captures." Doug. 252, 253. It is but justice, however, to observe, that sir William Scott has expressed doubts of the correctness of the report of this decision. The Hoop, 1 Rob. 182. Am. ed. But, in a subsequent case, Gist v. Mason, which was decided on by the court of king's bench, in the year 1786, lord Mansfield appears to have been even astute, to establish his favourite doctrines, and to give, as much as possible, a legal sanction to the trade of British subjects with enemies, and to their insurances on enemy's property.

This was not a case of insurance on property belonging to enemies, but on English property shipped on board of a neutral vessel, employed in the trade between Ireland and the enemy's colonies. The report does not state, whether the insurance was on the ship and goods, or on the vessel only, but it could not have made any material difference; because, if it was unlawful for British subjects to ship their merchandize to the French colonies, the means could not be legal, when the end was prohibited.

In this case, lord Mansfield is reported to have said: "This, on the face of it, is the case of a neutral vessel. It is no where laid down, that policies on considered as lawful. The very property taken by our own subjects from the enemy, might be claimed by the underwriters. And why should it not, if their contract was legal? It is well neutral property, though bound to an enemy's port, are void. And, indeed, I know of no cases, (except two, both of which are short notes,) that prohibit a subject trading with the enemy. By the maritime law, trading with an enemy, is cause of confiscation in a subject, provided he is taken in the act, but this does not extend to neutral vessels." 1 Term Rep. 85. Lord Mansfield here appears to have, as much as possible, kept the cargo out of view, and to have endeavoured to palliate the illegality of its destination, by holding up the neutrality of the vessel.

As to the expediency of permitting such insurances, he expressed himself in a clear and decided manner. "It is," said he, "for the benefit of the country, to permit these contracts, upon two accounts; the one, because you hold the box, and are sure of getting the premiums, at least, as a certain profit—the other, because it is a certain mode of obtaining intelligence of the enemy's designs." Park on Ins. 316. 6th edit.

But, during the last war, the tribunals of England entirely discarded their former ill judged policy, and restored, to all appearance, on a firm basis, the ancient principle of the law of nations. In the year 1794, a death blow was given to insurances on enemy's property, in the cases of Brandon v. Nesbitt, and Bristow v. Towers. 6 Term Rep. 23. 35. Nothing, however, was finally decided, as to the legality of trading with an enemy, until sir William Scott, in the year 1799, gave his able and luminous judgment, in the case of the Hoop, Cornelis, 1 Rob. 165. Am. ed. which was soon followed by that of the court of king's bench, in Potts v. Bell. 8 Term Rep. 548, in which it was held to be illegal, on general principles, for a subject to trade with an enemy. We observe with pleasure, that these decisions were principally founded on the authority of the irresistible arguments of our author in the present chapter; it is not the only instance in which he has had the honour of giving the law to the tribunals of the great nations of Europe.

That lord Mansfield made the well known principles of the law of nations yield to his favourite policy, is at present too well authenticated to be denied. "On the legality of these insurances," says Mr. Justice Buller, "I never could get him to reason. He never went beyond the ground of expediency." Bell v. Gilson. 1 Bos. & Pul. 354. "He always," says lord Alvanley, "entertained doubts upon the law, and endeavoured to keep out of sight, a question which might oblige him to decide against what he thought for the benefit of the country." Furtado v. Rogers. 3 Bos. & Pul. 197.

From this and other instances which might be adduced, it is evident, that the law in England is made to subserve the great political interests of the nation, and varies with the notions of policy that are entertained at different times. It behoves us, therefore, to consider how far we are bound implicitly to adopt the rules laid down by English judges, in cases which may affect their political concerns, on the mistaken supposition that they are founded on the principles of the ancient common law. The situation and interests of known, that property insured, belongs in a certain manner to the insurers, and they are, in a great degree, identified with the owners, as appears by the printed policies that are in every body's hands. If, then, the underwriters could thus claim enemy's property, after it had been lawfully captured, it would not only occasion a considerable loss to the captors, but it would, (as the edict justly observes,) deter them from fitting out vessels to cruise against the enemies of the state. Surely, there can be nothing more directly in opposition to the law of war.*

America and Great-Britain are known to differ in many essential points, and therefore, the rules by which the one is led to prosperity, may prove greatly injurious to the other. We have had frequent occasion to observe, that many of their belligerent principles are entirely unsuited to our neutral situation, and this is so true, that the state legislatures have been obliged to make laws to counteract the effects of the application of British doctrines, as has lately been done in Pennsylvania, with respect to the conclusiveness of the sentences of foreign prize courts. But, we observe also, with regret, that in some of the states they have gone so far as to prohibit the reading or citing, in courts of justice, of British adjudications of a date posterior to the American revolution. It is paying a poor compliment to the patriotism and intelligence of the judges who grace the benches of our superior tribunals, and a degrading tribute to the presumed superiority of British jurists, to suppose, that their opinions would obtain an undue influence or ascendancy over those of our own countrymen. To the sound discriminating minds of our enlightened judges, (aided from time to time by special legislative acts,) it might safely have been left to decide, how far the principles adopted by the tribunals of Great-Britain are consonant with our own national policy, which undoubtedly is as much a part of our law, as that of the English is a part of theirs. T.

* It does not seem to follow, because the loss suffered by the capture of enemy's property may be recovered from the underwriters, that the property itself may be recovered by the insurers from the captors; but the effect of such insurances is certainly, as Valin happily expresses it, that the nation which permits them, restores with one hand what it takes with the other.

We cannot help adverting here to what might be considered as another striking instance of injudicious policy, if we were not assured from high authority, that it originated in misapprehension and mistake. We mean to speak of the doctrine of conclusiveness, as applied to the sentences of foreign prize courts, which has so often frustrated, to the great loss of the parties insured, the insurances made in England upon neutral property. The ships and cargoes of neutrals are insured there for high war premiums, against capture and its attendant confiscation by the enemies of Great-Britain; but, as the law is understood in that country, (and surely the unfortunate neutral is not aware

So far, no fault can be found with the said edict of the 1st of April 1622. But I have discovered a supplement to it, of the 13th of May in the same year, by which it was declared, that the edict should only operate on those insurances which were or should be made after its publication; as if this was a proper subject for the application of the rules of the Roman code, on the subject of ex post facto laws.* It would seem, of it, otherwise he would not subscribe to such an unequal contract), if condemnation takes place, the sentence is in most cases considered as conclusive evidence of the property insured being enemy's property, and the innocent neutral being thus convicted of fraud, the insurer is allowed to retain the præmium and to pay no loss. In this manner, præmiums to an immense amount, have been earned by English underwriters, without risk, and neutrals have paid their money without being compensated for their losses. Such are the effects of the celebrated doctrine of conclusiveness of foreign sentences, so justly reprobated by two of the greatest law characters of our age, lords Thurlow and Ellenborough; Donaldson v. Thompson, 1 Campb. N. P. Rep. 429. These consequences were not contemplated, we are sure, by the respectable judges of England; but they, nevertheless, certainly followed, and at last it was found necessary to tolerate the evasion of that law by a special clause annexed to policies of insurance; (Lothian v. Henderson, 3 Bos. & Pul. 499.) otherwise, the British insurance offices would have been entirely deserted by neutrals. And yet it is supposed to be founded on a principle of the law and comity of nations, which, we would presume, it does not belong to individuals to dispense with.

It is much to be wished, that this fatal doctrine may be exploded throughout the United States, as it is in Pennsylvania and New-York. While our property is more than ever exposed to the captures of belligerent cruisers, and to the unjust condemnations of foreign tribunals, the effects of such a principle must be to deprive our citizens of the benefit of insurance in such cases, and thus to further the views of those powers who may wish to check our commercial career. We do not receive immense sums in præmiums from foreigners; American property, principally, is insured in our offices, and those insurances ought to be made as effectual as possible, that the risk and the loss may be divided among many, instead of falling upon a few. It is true, that we, also, can evade the doctrine in question, by a special clause; but a law which requires to be evaded is a snare to the unwary, and is necessarily a bad law.

We beg leave to refer the reader on this subject to the able and conclusive opinion of the honourable judge Cooper, of Pennsylvania, delivered in the high court of errors and appeals of this state, in the case of Dempsey v. The Insurance Company of Pennsylvania, and published with an excellent introduction, by Mr. Dallas; Philadelphia, Byrne, 1810. T.

* Leges & constitutiones futuris certum est dare formam negotiis, non ad facta præterita revocari: nisi nominatim & de præterito tempore, & adhuc pendentibus that the states-general considered that the insurance of enemy's property was legal, unless it was prohibited by an express law, otherwise, there was no reason for not annulling those insurances which were made before the publication of the edict, as well as those which were made afterwards. The edict had been very properly expressed in general terms, and had made no such exception; and, as it did not enact a new law, but was merely declaratory of the law of war, the supplement is rather to be considered as an oversight of the legislature, than as a law actually binding. So much of the edict, indeed, as inflicts a penalty, may very properly have been restricted to future cases; but not so the prohibition itself: unless, perhaps, we should say, that the insurance of enemy's property had before prevailed to such a considerable extent, that it had acquired the force of an ancient custom or usage. Nevertheless, even if there should be a great many instances of insurances of that description, I would not take it to be such an usage as is considered to have the force of law, unless it should be confirmed by an uninterrupted series of judicial decisions.

The states-general, therefore, acted in conformity to the law of nations, when, on the 31st of December 1657, they made an edict, prohibiting the insurance of the goods of the Portuguese, with whom we were then at war; but I cannot say the same thing of a clause which they added to it, by which they extended the prohibition to the insurance of any merchandize whatever, going to or coming from the Portuguese dominions: for, if those goods belonged to subjects of the states-general, or to allies or neutrals, there was no reason to prohibit their being insured, as the trade with Portugal was not prohibited, except as far as related to contraband of war. To these, therefore, the prohibition ought to have been restricted; in other respects, the freedom of insurance ought to have been co-extensive with the freedom of trade. The states-general, however, on the 9th of March 1665, being at war with England, issued a similar edict, by which they prohibited the insuring of any merchandize going to or coming from the English dominions. They did the same thing on the 9th of March 1689, during the war with France, and thus interrupted the lawful commerce, not only of our own subjects, but of foreigners.* It is thus, that edict-makers content themselves with transcribing those of a prior date, and when once an error (though ever so contrary to the law of nations) has crept into one of them, it is copied, without reflection, into every new law that is made on the same subject, and no one troubles himself about rectifying it.

Upon the whole, it appears, even from subsequent edicts of the states-general, that it is not lawful to make insurance on enemy's property; and because the thing is of daily occurrence, I wish the prohibition had been inserted in all the general and special laws which the states-general have enacted from time to time, respecting that species of contract. I wish also, that Straccha, Santerna, and other semi-barbarians,† who have written on the subject of insurance, had left this question entirely untouched, and had contented themselves with observing, that unlawful merchandize, as for instance, contra-

* It would seem, however, that although it is not lawful for a belligerent nation to obstruct the commerce of neutrals with their enemies, yet they may lawfully prohibit insurances on such trade within their own dominions, and that such a prohibition is no more than the lawful exercise of the right of municipal legislation. T.

† Our author is much too severe on those ancient writers, to whom we are indebted for the first methodical treatises on commercial and maritime law. Nor has he spared that venerable work, the Consolato, (above, p. 44), which has been the foundation of almost every subsequent maritime code. Far from joining in his opinion, we wish that those books were more frequently read and consulted than they are; they would be found to contain many excellent principles, which, in our modern times, have been unfortunately too much lost sight of. See the excellent decree of judge Davis, (district judge of Massachusetts), on an important question, respecting mariner's wages, the solution of which has been afforded him by a text of the Consolato. 2 Amer. Law Journ. 359. Il Consol. c. 127. and in M. Boucher's translation, c. 130. vol. ii. p. 195. § 321. T.

band of war, could not be insured. For my part, I shall express in a few words, what I conceive to be the law upon this subject. I think, that it is not lawful to insure any ships or goods which are liable to capture by the law of war; but as to those which cannot be made lawful prize, I see no reason why they should not be insured.

I shall conclude with adverting to what some of our writers have said on the subject of insuring goods which are liable to condemnation. *Grotius is of opinion, that he who has insured contraband goods, not knowing them to be such, is not bound to pay the loss. Others have said,† that he who has subscribed a policy in general terms, is released from his engagement, if the owner of the goods insured turns out afterwards to have been an enemy; for, enemy's property is never considered as being included in a general description, but must be expressly declared and made known to be such, to the underwriter.‡

* Consil. Holland. vol. 3. Cons. 175.

† Ibid. vol. 2. Consil. 322.

‡ A very correct general rule has lately been introduced in England, upon this subject. "Whenever," says Park, "an insurance is made on a voyage expressly prohibited by the common, statute or maritime law of the country, the policy is of no effect. Park on Ins. 307. 6th ed. Even though the insurance be made in general terms, a clause or proviso, excluding the prohibited risk, is always considered as ingrafted in the policy. Furtado v. Rogers, 3 Bos. & Pul. 191. Kellner v. Le Mesurier; Brandon v. Curling, 4 East, 396. 410.

According to the above decisions, the capture of neutral vessels by the cruisers of Great-Britain or her co-belligerents, is considered as a prohibited risk, "because," says lord Ellenborough, "it is repugnant to the interest of the state, and has a tendency to render the British operations by sea ineffectual." Kellner v. Le Mesurier, 4 East, 402. This is certainly correct, on the ground of state policy; but, another reason, founded on the broad basis of the law of nations, is afforded by our own judge FJohnson, (one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States, and presiding judge of the courts which compose the sixth federal circuit:) "a neutral," says he, "who is captured for having violated his neutrality, is considered by the belligerent as an enemy waging an individual war against his nation, and is abandoned by his own government as such." Rose v. Himely, Bee's Admiralty Reports, 322. It follows, from this principle, that all risks of capture, by the armed vessels of the nation to which the insurer belongs, may be properly classed within the general prohibition against insuring

But, I think, that even though it be expressly mentioned and designated in the policy, yet, when enemy's property or contraband goods are insured, the insurance is void, and it depends on the will of the parties to fulfil or not, the contract which they have entered into; but no judicial recovery can be had thereon.

enemy's property. And, indeed, according to the formula which is used at present by the courts of admiralty of Great-Britain, whatever may be, in point of fact, the specific ground of condemnation of a neutral vessel or cargo, no other reason is assigned in the decree, but that it belonged, at the time of capture, to the enemies of that country. Horne's Compend. 148.

CHAPTER XXII.

Of enlisting Men in foreign countries, and, incidentally, of Expatriation.

I ENTER upon the discussion of a question which has been, and is still, the cause of much disturbance in many of the kingdoms and states of Europe: Whether it is lawful to enlist men in the territory of a friendly sovereign? Let it not be imagined, that I mean to contend, that it is lawful to entice away soldiers, by bribes or solicitations, from the service of another prince, in order to enlist them into our own. I know too well, that those who promote desertion, are not less guilty, and do not deserve a less punishment than the deserters themselves;* and, indeed, among some nations, that crime has even been construed into high treason. The question which I am about to investigate, is of a quite different nature. It is, whether a prince may, in the territory of a friendly sovereign, enlist private individuals who are not soldiers, and make use of them in war against his own enemies? It is certain, that if a prince prohibits his subjects from transferring their allegiance and entering into the army or navy of another sovereign, such sovereign cannot, with propriety, enlist them into his service; but, where no such prohibition exists, (as is the case in most of the countries of Europe), it is lawful, in my opinion, for the subject to abandon his country, migrate into another, and there serve his new sovereign in a military capacity.

* The important question respecting the delivering up, or as it is called, the extradition of deserters from one country to another, has been the subject of much controversy in America as well as in Europe, and is not yet at rest. It has been but slightly touched upon by some of the writers on the law of nations, and by others not at all. Vattel says nothing upon it. Hubner lays it down as a general principle, that "a neutral sovereign may receive in his dominions, and even among the number of his subjects, deserters from either of the belligerent armies, unless he is obliged to deliver them up by a special convention, called a cartel." 1 Hubn. De la Saisie, &c. p. 39. But Galiani distinguishes and contends, that if the army from which the soldiers desert is on the neutral territory at the time when the desertion takes place, as for instance, if it has been allowed the right of passage, the neutral sovereign is bound to deliver up those who have deserted their colours within his dominions; otherwise, it will be considered as a violation of the laws of hospitality. Galiani, De' doveri, &c. l. 1. c. 8. § 4. T.

It is lawful, I repeat it, if there is no law that prohibits it, for a subject to change his condition, and transfer his allegiance from one sovereign to another. The writers on public law are all of this opinion; nor does Grotius dissent from them, but he adds, that expatriation is not lawful among the Muscovites; and we know, that it is unlawful also among the English and Chinese. We know likewise, that Louis XIV. king of France,* declared by an edict of the 13th of August 1669, that those of his subjects who should, without the permission of the government, emigrate from his dominions, with the intention never to return, should be punished with the forfeiture of life and goods. Before that period, it was lawful to emigrate from France, and it is so wherever the country is not a prison.† And if it is lawful for a subject

* This edict was made with a view to the Protestants. It was in the same year that Louis the XIV. began to violate the edict of Nantz, by abolishing the chambres mi-parties, tribunals consisting of judges of both religions, which that edict had established. Hénault, Abrégé de l'Hist. de Fr. sub anno 1669. He foresaw the immense emigration which its final repeal would produce, and thus vainly endeavoured to prevent it. T.

† By the first constitution of Pennsylvania, made on the 28th of September 1776, it was declared, (c. 1. § 15.), "that all men have a natural inherent right to emigrate from one state to another that will receive them." 1 Dallas's Laws of Penn. append. p. 54. The present constitution merely provides, (art. 9. § 25), "That emigration from the state shall not be prohibited." 3 Dallas's Laws of Penn. p. xxii.

The question, "whether it is lawful for a citizen to expatriate himself," has been brought several times, and in various shapes, before the supreme court of the United States. It was made a point, incidentally, in the case of Talbot v. Jansen, mentioned above, p. 136. In that case, it appeared to be the opinion of the court, that expatriation is lawful, provided it is effected at such time, in such manner, and under such circumstances as not to endanger the peace or safety of the United States. "The cause of removal," said judge Patterson, "must be lawful, otherwise, the emigrant acts contrary to his duty, and is justly charged with a crime. Can that emigration be legal and justifiable, which commits or endangers the neutrality, peace or safety of the nation of which the emigrant is a member?" 3 Dallas's Reports, 153.— "That a man," said judge Iredell, "ought not to be a slave; that he should not be confined against his will to a particular spot, because he happened to draw his first breath upon it; that he should not be compelled to continue in a society to which he is accidentally attached, when he can better his situation elsewhere; much less where he must starve in one country, and may live comfortably in another, are positions which I hold as strongly as any man, and they are such as most nations of the world appear clearly to recognize. The only difference of opinion is, as to the proper manner of exercising this right." Ibid. 162. Judge Cushing concurred in the general principle, that expatriation is lawful, and approved of the doctrine laid down on this subject by Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Nat. and Gent. l. 2. c. 10. "But," said he, "the act of expatriation should be bonâ fide, and manifested at least by the emigrant's actual removal, with his family and effects, into another country." Ibid. 169. In the case then before the court, no such removal had taken place.

In that of Murray v. The Charming Betsy, it was decided, that a citizen of the United States who has bonâ fide expatriated himself, is to be considered as an alien for commercial purposes. One Shattuck, a natural born citizen of the United States, had for many years, resided with his family, and had been naturalized in the Danish island of St. Thomas. It was objected to him, that he had traded from that island with the French colonies, in fraud of an act of congress, by which all trade was interdicted to the citizens of the United States, with the dominions of France. But, the court were of opinion, "that an American citizen may acquire, in a foreign country, the commercial privileges attached to his domicile, and be exempted from the operation of the general prohibitory laws of his native country." The court did not, however, determine, whether a citizen of the United States can divest himself absolutely of that character, otherwise than in such manner as may be prescribed by our own laws, nor whether his expatriation would be sufficient to rescue him from punishment, for a crime committed against the United States. 2 Cranch's Reports, 120.

And lastly, in the case of M'Ilvaine v. Cox's lessee, it was determined, that a citizen of New-Jersey, who had gone over to the enemy during the revolutionary war, and had, since that time, remained in England, enjoying the privileges of a British subject, had not ceased to be a citizen of New-Jersey, and was entitled to claim lands by descent, in that state, because several laws had been made by its legislature, some before and others after his emigration, by which emigrants of that description were declared to be fugitive citizens and traitors, punishable as such, but were not considered as aliens. Cranch's Reports, vol. ii. p. 280. vol. iv. p. 209. T.

livelihood, and why may he not do it by entering into the land or sea service? In the United Provinces there is certainly no law to prevent it, and many Dutchmen, formerly, as well as within my own recollection, have served other sovereigns by sea as well as by land.

When I speak of other sovereigns, I only mean those who are in amity with us; for, it is not lawful to enter into the military service of an enemy, by land or sea, and the states-general have prohibited it by several edicts. It may, indeed, be said, that several of the edicts which prohibit our citizens entering into the service of any foreign prince or state, as they speak in general terms, must be understood in the same manner, and not be exclusively applied to the service of an enemy. But, if those edicts are attentively examined, it will be found, that they are either occasional statutes, made in time of war, when the states-general were in want of men, or that they are expressly directed against those who then were or might afterwards have gone into the enemy's service, or against deserters from our own army or navy, who had enlisted themselves abroad. Once, a Dutch vessel was captured by a French privateer, having eighty men on board, all of them (except six Frenchmen) natives of Holland or Zealand; the states-general, justly exasperated, issued an edict, on the 28th of July 1674, by which it was decreed, that if any of our subjects should enter into the naval service of the enemy, they should be drowned. A similar edict was made on the 4th of April 1676. But those edicts only relate to such as serve the enemies of our country, and cannot be extended to those who enter into the service of a power in friendship or in alliance with us.

If, therefore, our subjects, whose assistance we do not want in time of war, and who are not prevented by any law from transferring their allegiance, may lawfully hire out their military services to a friendly prince, why may not also that friendly prince enlist soldiers in the territory of a friendly nation? Where it is lawful to let out to hire, it is lawful also to hire, and why should it not be equally so to contract for the hiring of soldiers in the territory of a friend, as to make any other contract, and carry on any kind of trade. It will be objected, perhaps, that he who enlists the soldiers, may make use of them against a friend of the sovereign in whose country they have been hired, and perhaps also, against that sovereign himself; but these objections, in my opinion, are not of sufficient force.

As to the first supposition, that the soldiers may be employed to fight against a friend of their own sovereign, it must be observed, that neutrals are bound in war to consider both the belligerents as equally in the right. Such is the doctrine generally admitted as to the purchase and sale of warlike implements, which, indeed, we may not lawfully carry, but we may, in our own country, lawfully sell to either or both the belligerent parties, although we well know, that they intend to make use of them in war against each other.

To the second head of the objection, that the soldiers thus hired may possibly be employed against their own sovereign, I answer, that we are only to attend to the state of our country at the time, and ought not to look so far into futurity. Nor do I see any difference between enlisting men, and purchasing gun-powder, ammunition, arms and warlike stores, which may certainly be done by a friendly sovereign in our country, and which he may also use afterwards against us. I repeat it, the actual relations of our country are alone to be considered; otherwise, there must be an end to amity, friendship, and even alliances between princes.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the same law which obtains as to the purchase of implements of war, must apply in like manner to the enlistment of soldiers in the territory of a friendly nation, unless it should be expressly stipulated otherwise between the two sovereigns. Thus, in the treaty between the Romans and Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, the latter bound himself not to enlist soldiers within the limits of the Roman empire.* That treaty was not equal, otherwise he might lawfully have enlisted soldiers in the Roman dominions, nor could the senate have prohibited it without doing him an injury; for, while by the same treaty it was stipulated, on reciprocal terms, that neither of the contracting parties should supply the enemy of the other with provisions, to Antiochus alone it was forbidden to do that which otherwise may lawfully be done by every sovereign.

In the United Provinces, however, it appears to have been and is still prohibited by law, to enlist soldiers, without the permission of the states-general. There is an ancient edict upon this subject, of the 8th of January 1529. A similar edict was made on the 1st of August 1612, when the Danes, Swedes and Muscovites had made enlistments on the Dutch territory. Those nations were prohibited, by name, from doing the like, without having previously obtained the permission of the states-general in writing, and they were strictly forbidden to seduce the Dutch soldiers from the national service, under the penalty of death or some other discretionary punishment. There are a variety of subsequent edicts,* by which it is enacted, “that if any one shall seduce soldiers within the territory or jurisdiction of the United Netherlands, without the permission, in writing, of the states-general or their counsellors, the offender shall be liable, not to a discretionary penalty only, but to the punishment of death, without remission or mitigation.”† As those edicts agree en-

† By the act of Congress of the 5th of June 1794, mentioned in one of the preceding notes, page 129, it is provided (§ 2.) “that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlist or enter himself, or hire or retain another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States, with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince or state as a soldier, or as a marine or seamen on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque or privateer; every person so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and be fined not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisoned not exceeding three years. Provided, that this shall not be construed to extend to any subject or citizen of a foreign prince or state, who shall transiently be within the United States, and shall, on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque or privateer, which, at the time of its arrival within

It may not be improper to notice here, a difference which took place in the year 1666, between the states-general, and the governor-general of the Spanish Netherlands. The states complained to him, that the bishop of Munster, with whom they were at war, had enlisted soldiers in the Spanish territories in the Low Countries. The governor answered, that he had not authorised him so to do, but that if he had, there was nothing to prevent him, as Spain was neutral in the war, and that the states-general might exercise the same right, if they pleased.* But, whether such a thing is lawful, without the consent of the sovereign, and whether the sovereign may, with propriety, refuse his permission, when applied to for it, is the very subject of our inquiry. Whether or not, the bishop of Munster had a right to enlist soldiers in the Spanish Netherlands, without the permission of the governor-general, the reader must determine for himself from what has been above stated.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Of the right of the several provinces of the United Netherlands to declare and make war.

IN this chapter our author discusses a constitutional question, relating exclusively to his own country, under its former government. He inquires, "whether the united provinces of the Netherlands had separately the right of declaring and making war. From the tenor of one of the articles of the Confederation of Utrecht, (the federal constitution of the Dutch union), it would seem that they had not that power; for, it is there expressly stipulated, "that no war shall be made without the advice and consent of all the provinces;" but our author contends and argues at great length, that every power which by that treaty was not expressly granted, was retained by the several provinces; that before it was entered into, they separately had the right of declaring and making war, and had not explicitly parted with it. That the above-mentioned clause in their confederation was only applicable to national wars, entered into for the redress of national injuries; but that if a single province should receive an injury from a foreign state, it might lawfully avenge it by a separate war.

As we do not think that this chapter can interest our readers in any point of view, we have omitted it in this translation, and believe it sufficient to have given this general outline of its contents.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Of Reprisals.

REPRISALS* were a thing entirely unknown to the ancient Romans, and cannot be expressed by an adequate word in their language. Some writers have used the words pignoratio, clarigatio, but neither of them renders with precision what we understand by reprisals. Nor had the Romans occasion for such a word, who paid the most sacred regard to the property of their friends, and who would have disdained to commit hostilities on those for whom they professed friendship, and to subject their good friends to indiscriminate plunder, by sea and land.

As there is no instance of such wickedness in the history of that magnanimous people, neither do their laws exhibit

* The word reprisal, according to its etymology, is synonymous with recaption or retaking, and the thing which is meant by it, is analogous in name as well as in substance, to the common law process of withernam; with this difference, that the one is a legal retaliation, exercised only on the goods and chattels of the party who has been guilty of the first tortious taking; the other is exercised on the property of all the individuals of the same nation. "For," says Valin, "it is a principle established by the universal law of nations, that all the subjects of a state are bound in solidum, to make reparation for the injuries done to foreigners by the state itself, or any of its members." Traité des Prises, p. 321.

Reprisals are either general or special.—They are general, when a sovereign, who has, or thinks that he has received an injury from another prince, issues orders to his military officers, and delivers commissions to his subjects to take the persons and property of the subjects of the other nation, wherever the same may be found. It is, at present, the first step which is generally taken at the commencement of a public war, and is considered as equivalent to a declaration of it.

Special reprisals are granted, in time of peace, to individuals who have suffered an injury from the subjects of another nation, and these alone are treated of in the present chapter.

the least trace of it. How then shall we explain the stipulation which is contained in two different treaties* between Spain and the United Provinces, “that no letters of marque† or reprisal shall be granted, but with full knowledge of the cause, against those persons only on whom they may lawfully be issued by the Imperial laws and constitutions, and conforming to the regulations which those laws prescribe?” For, in the laws of Justinian, which are always understood by the general description of Imperial laws in countries that are not governed by an emperor, there is not a single word about reprisals, which, as I have already observed, were entirely unknown to the Romans. In order to rescue from the imputation of ignorance, the very learned men who drew up those treaties, I must suppose, that by Imperial laws, they meant the law of nations, which, as well as the law of Justinian, is denominated throughout Europe, the common law,‡ so that they must have considered the words common and Imperial law, as convertible terms. I cannot think of any other way of accounting for that mistake.

According to the law of nations, then, reprisals are not to be granted but with a full knowledge of the cause,§ nor for

* Truce of the 9th of April 1609, art. 11.—Treaty of Munster, of the 23d of January 1648, art. 22.

† Letter of marque and reprisal is the old technical expression for what we now call a privateer's commission. It still preserves, in law, the same signification, although it is common, at present, to apply the denomination letter of marque, by way of distinction, to a vessel fitted out for war and merchandize, and armed merely for defence. T.

§ In order that letters of reprisal may not be granted, without full knowledge of the cause, or without sufficient reasons, various wise precautions were taken by Louis XIV. in his Ordonnance de la Marine, of August 1681. By that ordinance, the party injured, is obliged, as soon as possible after the injury suffered, to cause the facts to be ascertained, and the damage to be estimated by a court of admiralty; after which, and not before, he may petition the crown for letters of reprisal; these are not issued until after a proper and fruitless application to the sovereign of the offending party, nor then, without sufficient security being given by the petitioner; and notwithstanding all that, if at a future day, the statement contained in the petition should be found not to be true, the petitioner is to be condemned to the payment of full damages and interest to the party whose pro-such causes or against such persons as the law exempts from them, nor then without conforming to the rules and order of proceeding which usage has established. The first of these rules, is, that letters of reprisal are not to be granted, unless there has been a clear and open denial of justice. Hence, by the treaties above mentioned,* it was agreed between us and Spain, “that if any injury should be done not warranted by the orders of his majesty on the one hand, or of the states-general on the other, the peace should not be thereby considered as ipso facto broken, but that it should be lawful, in case of an open denial of justice, to seek redress according to custom, by issuing letters of marque and reprisal.” Such is the common law, which has long been and still is used among nations, when justice is denied by the sovereign, and it is conformable to the opinion of all who have written on this subject. There is never any occasion for reprisals, except in time of peace, though Mornac† is of opinion, that they cannot be granted, except where there is actual war. But he is certainly mistaken.

Reprisals, therefore, are a means of redress, to be used only in case of a denial of justice. They are an authorization, granted by a sovereign, to take the persons and goods of the subjects of another prince; in order to obtain satisfaction for an injury‡ committed upon his own subjects,§ for which perty shall have been seized by virtue of the letters of reprisal, and moreover, to restore four times the amount which he shall have received. For the sake of greater regularity, letters of reprisal are, in all cases, to express the sum for which they are given, and to specify a time to which their exercise is limited, and after the expiration of which, they become void. Ord. de la Mar. l. 3. tit. 10. Des Représailles. T.

* Art. 31, of the truce, and 60 of the treaty above mentioned.

† Ad auth. sed omnino, cod. ne uxor pro marito.

‡ Valin is of opinion, that letters of reprisal may be granted not only for reparation of an injury done by means of actual force and violence, but also for a debt justly due by a subject of a foreign power, for which the creditor has not been able to obtain justice in a regular course of legal proceedings. Traité des Prises, p. 321. T.

§ Mr. Valin is also of opinion, that not only a subject, by birth or naturalization, may apply for and obtain letters of reprisal, but also a justice has been denied by the sovereign of the offending party. Thus, an injury committed by force and violence, and not repressed by the competent magistrate, is redressed by the same means and in the same manner.

In order that no one should rashly complain of a denial of justice, special provisions have been made by treaties between different nations. By the 24th article of the treaty of peace between England and the states-general of the 5th of April 1654, reprisals are not to take place, except sub modo; for, it is there stipulated, “that letters of reprisal shall not be granted, unless the prince, whose subject shall conceive himself to have been injured, shall first lay his complaint before the sovereign whose subject is supposed to have committed the tortious act, and unless that sovereign shall not cause justice to be rendered to him within three months after his application. This stipulation was renewed by the 31st article of the treaty of peace between the same nations, of the 31st of July 1667.

There are many other instances of treaties between nations, in which this subject has been attended to. In the treaty of commerce between the king of France and the states-general, of the 27th of April 1669, article 17, after stipulating, that reprisals shall not be resorted to, unless justice shall have been first denied, it is immediately added, “that justice shall not be considered as having been denied, unless the petition by which letters of reprisal are applied for shall have been first communicated to the ambassador of the sovereign whose subjects are complained of, that he may inquire into the truth of the complaint, and if he finds it true, that he may cause justice to be done to the injured party within four months.* Thus, without foreigner, domiciliated in the country (regnicola;) the state being bound also to protect him, and to consider the injury done to him as an affront to the majesty of the sovereign. Ibid. p. 225. T.

* By the treaty of Ryswick, art. 9, and the treaty of Utrecht, art. 16, (the latter concluded between England and France on the 11th of April 1713), it is stipulated, “that letters of reprisal shall not thereafter be granted by either of the high contracting parties, to the prejudice or detriment of the subjects of the other, except only in such case wherein justice is denied or delayed; which denial or delay of justice shall not be regarded as verified, unless the petitions of the person who desires the said letters of reprisal any violation of the existing peace, the sovereign against whose subjects a complaint is made, sits in judgment upon it, and pronounces his own sentence. It is certainly useful to restrict the use of reprisals by similar treaties; for, it would be unjust to take it away altogether between the subjects of independent nations.

It was, however, stipulated, by the 9th article of the treaty between the emperor of Morocco and the states-general, of the 24th of September 1610, “that neither of the two sovereigns should issue letters of reprisal, but that they should administer justice to each other’s subjects.” But this is an idle stipulation; for what is to be done, if justice is not administered? The injured sovereign will then have recourse to reprisals, and will say that he is compelled to it by the exigency of the case. If it be agreed between princes, that justice shall be mutually administered to the subjects of each other, that stipulation should be performed with good faith; but still, it is true, that the obligation to render justice to foreigners, exists independent of treaties, and whether there is or not, a special convention to that effect, reprisals are not to be resorted to, unless justice is previously denied.

It might, perhaps, be supposed, that reprisals are entirely taken away by the 16th article of the abovementioned treaty of the 5th of April 1654,* because it is there agreed, that if be communicated to the minister residing there, on the part of the prince against whose subjects they are requested to be granted; that within the space of four months or sooner, if it be possible, he may manifest the contrary, or procure the satisfaction which may be justly due. And if there should not be on the spot, any minister or ambassador from that sovereign, no letters of reprisal shall be issued until after the expiration of the four months, reckoning from the day on which the petition shall have been presented to the prince against whose subjects the letters are applied for, or to his privy council.”

The same stipulation is contained in substance, in the 3d article of the treaty of commerce concluded between Great-Britain and France, on the same day with the treaty of Utrecht, and in all the treaties made at Utrecht at the same time between the other powers; “and thus,” says M. Valin, “it has become a part of the common law of nations.” Traité des Prises, p. 331.—It is also contained (except the last clause) in the treaty of commerce between France and Great-Britain, of the 26th of September 1786, art. 3. T any one shall commit an infraction of the peace subsisting between the two powers, the infractor shall be punished, and judgment shall be given within a certain time, which is limited by the same article. But such an inference would not be correct, for, what if the criminal should not be punished, or if what he had forcibly taken away should not be restored? Reprisals, in such a case, would still have to be resorted to; and that such was the intention of the parties, appears by the 24th article of the same treaty, in which, as I have already shewn, there is a mode of proceeding pointed out for the granting of letters of reprisal. Since reprisals are in use among nations; these, and war, which follows close at their heels,* are the only remedies of independent sovereigns, for repelling unjust aggressions, as they cannot submit themselves to the judgment of a foreign prince, which they would consider as a shameful prostitution of their own majesty.

It seems that the power of granting letters of reprisal belongs to the sovereign alone; for, it is beyond the authority of subordinate magistrates. It is so observed every where, even in France, where formerly letters of reprisal were granted by the parliaments.† When the towns of the Netherlands waged separate wars, they, in like manner, granted letters of reprisal. There exists an ancient law of the city of Amsterdam, by which it was provided, that if any injury should be done to one of its citizens out of its territory and jurisdiction, either by main force and violence, or by an unjust judgment, (which last expression, I beg the reader will particularly observe), the

* Les représailles—sans annoncer précisément la guerre, y conduisent naturellement, & en sont assez souvent le prélude. Reprisals do not, it is true, precisely indicate war, but they naturally lead to that state of things, and are often enough a prelude to it. Valin, Traité des Prises, p. 321. T.

† Cetui droit est de puissance absolue, qui ne se communique ni délègue aux gouverneurs des provinces, villes & cités, amiraux, vice-amiraux ou autres magistrats. The right of granting letters of reprisal, is a right summi imperii, and cannot be communicated nor delegated to the governors of provinces, cities or towns, nor to the admirals, vice-admirals or other magistrates. Le Guidon, c. 10, art. 10. The parliaments of France, however, exercised it until the year 1485, when Charles VIII. by a special ordinance, reserved it exclusively to himself. Valin, ibid. p. 329. T.

aggrieved party should prefer his complaint to the magistrate of Amsterdam, who should write on the subject, to the magistracy of the place where the injury was committed, and if after receiving an answer, he should still think that his fellow-citizen had been injured and was entitled to redress, he should, by his judicial authority, indemnify the injured party, by issuing process against the persons or goods of the subjects of the prince whose subjects had done the injury, if they should be found within the territory of Amsterdam.*

I have observed, that this law of the city of Amsterdam, says, or by an unjust judgment. It is not enough that the property of our subjects or citizens be taken by virtue of a judgment, it must be also an unjust one. Of this, however, the magistrate of Amsterdam alone was to judge; for, such things are seldom trusted to the judgment of others.† The treaties between sovereigns merely say, that letters of reprisal are not to be granted, unless for a denial of justice; but an unjust sentence will easily be construed into such a denial, and indeed sovereigns will qualify as unjust, every sentence that is not agreeable to them.‡

* Those who have obtained letters of reprisal, may, by virtue thereof, seize within their own country, the goods and effects of the subjects of the power, whose subjects have done them the injury; but it must be done vid juris, by some judicial process, and not manu forti, by private authority, unless there should be danger of the property being carried out of the country, before application could be made to a competent magistrate. Valin, ibid. p. 333. T.

† See above, p. 72.

‡ In the letter of the duke of New-Castle, to Mons. Michell, on the subject of the celebrated controversy with the king of Prussia respecting the Silesia loan, are found the sentiments of the English jurists upon this subject. "The law of nations," say they, "founded upon justice, equity, convenience and the reason of the thing, and confirmed by long usage, does not allow of reprisals, except in case of violent injuries, directed or supported by the state, and justice absolutely denied in re minimè dubiâ, by all the tribunals, and afterwards by the prince.—Where the judges are left free, and give sentence according to their conscience, though it should be erroneous, that would be no ground for reprisals. Upon doubtful questions, different men think and judge differently; and all a friend can desire, is, that justice should be as impartially administered to him, as it is to the subjects of the prince in whose courts the matter is tried." 1 Magens on Insur. 491.

These

I have seen many instances in our own country, of letters of reprisal granted by cities and towns. They are vestiges of the ancient liberty of the Hollanders, when the several members of the states were more independent than the states themselves; for, the provincial states, ever since the confederation of Utrecht, although they are severally independent, cannot issue letters of reprisal generally and in every case. Indeed, it might be said, that they cannot issue them in any case, because they are a species of war, and by the 17th article of the said confederation, it is expressly declared to be unlawful for the several provinces to give any cause of war to foreign princes.

 The remainder of this chapter treats only of the right of the several provinces of the United Netherlands to issue letters of reprisal; our author thinks that they may do it in their own cause, for an injury done to themselves in their several capacities, but not for an injury done to the union. We have omitted this discussion, as uninteresting to our readers.

These principles are undoubtedly correct, on the supposition, that law and justice are every where impartially administered, according to the old established rules of the law and usage of nations; but where certain courts (as is at present the case in almost every country of Europe) are known to be mere political establishments, and are, properly speaking, ministerial boards, obliged to conform to the decrees and orders of the sovereign, and guided in their decisions by considerations of state policy, varying and fluctuating with every change in the aspect of national affairs, such impartiality from them can hardly be presumed, and tribunals so constituted, ought not to be held up as a shield to ward off the responsibility of the sovereign. In the case just cited, the king of Prussia was not satisfied with the plausible arguments of the English civilians, but demanded and obtained of the British court £ 20,000 sterling, as an indemnity for Prussian vessels and cargoes illegally condemned. Examination of the British doctrine, &c. p. 99. And there have been instances of commissioners being appointed, in pursuance of treaties between neutral and belligerent powers, to reform the unjust judgments of prize tribunals. Treaty between the United States and Great-Britain, of the 19th of November 1794, art. 7—between the United States and Spain, of the 27th of October 1795, art. 21. 2 *Laws U. CHAPTER XXV.

Miscellaneous Maxims and Observations.

I. IT is not lawful to take or retain possession of a neutral fortress, for fear the enemy should occupy it.

In the year 1620, the states-general, who had promised to evacuate the fortress of Lieroot, in East Friesland, did not do it, but kept possession of it, "lest," said they, "the enemy should occupy it, and make use of it against themselves." They were clearly in the wrong, and acted in this against the opinion of prince Maurice of Orange, who was no friend to the Frieslanders, and was warmly attached to the cause of the states. Their conduct was even blamed by their own counsellors, in 1621, and several times afterwards, as Aitzema relates.*

There are men, however, who call themselves lawyers, and who approve of similar injuries, among whom I wish I had not to name the celebrated Grotius.† I can tolerate such an opinion in such men as Zouch‡ and Buddæus;§ the former

* Aitz. l. 2.

† Hinc colligere est, quomodo ei, qui bellum pium gerit, liceat locum occupare, qui situs sit in solo pacato: nimirum si non imaginarium, sed certum sit periculum, ne hostis cum locum invadat, & inde irreparabilia damna det. Hence, it may be inferred, how it is lawful for one who is engaged in a lawful war, to occupy a place situated on neutral territory; particularly if there is a certain and not an imaginary danger of the enemy's occupying it, and from thence doing considerable injury to his adversary. *Grot. of whom, however, borrows it from Grotius. They support it by adducing instances of similar rapine, as if example, in such cases, were sufficient; while it is only solving a problem by another problem, litem quod lite resolvit. Nor is what they say about embargoes of ships at all analogous to the present case; for, ships that are found in the dominions of another sovereign, are in a manner subject to him, and those embargoes are laid by virtue of a custom universally received among sovereigns. But, it never has been admitted as a custom, that the dominions, towns or forts of a friendly nation, may otherwise than tortiously be invaded or retained.

II. Conquered countries, like lands purchased, pass CUM ONERE.

The king of Spain had hypothecated a certain territory for a sum of money which he had borrowed of one who was in friendship with him and the states-general. The states conquered that territory in the course of a war. The counselors of Holland were of opinion, that the pledge was extinct.* But they were mistaken, for the states had only conquered what belonged to the king of Spain, that is to say, the right of empire and dominion, as he had possessed it. And as he held it subject to that hypothecation, it could not pass over to the states in any other manner. If the states, instead of conquering, had purchased from the king a part of that territory, the creditor would still have been entitled to his whole pledge. He would have preserved his rights against the king of Spain, the vendor, who had bound himself for the debt, and against the states-general, who had purchased the land hypothecated for its payment, because property, when sold, passes with all its charges, which remain entire for the benefit of the creditor. But now the Dutch have taken the territory, and consider it as confiscated to them. And so it is, as far as it belonged to the king of Spain, but that does not include the interest which the neutral creditor had in it. If the hypothecated debt, indeed, had belonged to an enemy, it might also have been justly confiscated by the law of war.

* Consil. Belg. vol. 3. Consil. 2.

III. *Property captured and afterwards ransomed or given up by the enemy, is not thereby liberated from the claims of the insurer or lender at maritime risk.

It has been questioned, whether property, particularly ships and merchandize, which after being captured, are ransomed or given up by the enemy, to their former owner, are thereby exonerated from the prior claims of the insurers or of those who had lent money thereon at maritime risk? Some lawyers have been of opinion,† that if a ship has been ransomed, or if the captor has given her up to her former owner, she has, as it were, ceased to be entire, and she is to be considered as a new ship, and that a total loss has taken place with respect to the insurers and lenders at maritime risk.

But this appears to me, neither just nor equitable, because the insurer is only responsible for the damage suffered, and the money lender only liable to a loss on the amount of his loan in proportion to that damage. The one, therefore, is not bound to pay, nor the other to lose more, than the amount of the salvage or ransom. Philip the II. in his ordinance upon insurance, of the 20th of January 1550,‡ section 27, prohibits the ransoming of vessels from pirates, and therefore permits it from real enemies, with a view, no doubt, to shew, that the insurers are bound for the amount of the salvage, but no farther; otherwise, there was no reason for speaking of ransom in an edict which exclusively relates to the subject of insurance. Nay, the last clause of the policies in common use among the merchants sufficiently shews, that when a ship is ransomed, the interest which the insurers have therein, is not less redeemed than the property of the owner himself. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the loss or damage which the insurers are bound to pay, and which the lenders at maritime risk are obliged to lose, is the precise amount of the money expended in the salvage or redemption of the property. I grant, however, that if a ship has been captured, carried into port, and there condemned and sold, and afterwards is purchased by her first owners, in that case the loss will be total to the underwriters and money lenders; and the ship thus purchased, will be considered as a new ship in the hands of the first owner. There is an opinion to this effect in the Consilia Belgica.*

* The civil law denominates maritime loans or loans at maritime risk, (fœnus nauticum), those contracts which at common law are called bottomry and respondentia. T.

IV. Orders, in war, are to be strictly obeyed.

The states-general had ordered, that their troops, who held the citadel of Reyd, in the country of Juliers, should obey the orders of Florence van den Boetseler, who was lord of the place. Boetseler exhibited that order to the commandant of the fort, and required him to deliver it up to the Spaniards, who were approaching, and the commandant accordingly surrendered it up on the 30th of August 1621.† But Maurice, prince of Orange, was so angry with him on that account, that he punished him with death on the 14th of September following, pretending that the order was only applicable to civil and not to military matters. I doubt whether he did right; for, as the citadel did not belong to the states-general, that order can have meant nothing, but that the rights of the lord of the territory, although he had admitted a garrison within it, were to be kept inviolate, and that the soldiers should not defend the citadel any longer than the lord should think proper, lest he should be involved in the same difficulty with the Spaniards, in which the count of East Friesland found himself, when the states refused to evacuate fort Lieroort, as I have mentioned at the beginning of this chapter.

V. It is not lawful to repair fortifications during a truce, or pending a capitulation.

Albericus Gentilis‡ is of opinion, that while a treaty is on foot concerning the surrender of a town or place, it is lawful to finish or repair the fortifications thereof. Zouch,§ after him, adopts the same opinion. But Ferdinand thought otherwise, who, after the surrender of Reggio, precipitated the French on that very account from the top of the walls;* and when the Spaniards, who, in 1622, were besieging Bergen, during a truce which had been granted to them to bury their dead, completed their works, and from thence reconnoitered the fortifications of the town, the Dutch complained that the truce had been broken, and that the usage of war had been violated.† It was, however, in 1664, agreed at Bylerschans, that the truce should not prevent the erecting and perfecting of fortifications on both sides.‡ But it is best, when a truce is made, to suspend every warlike operation, for, such appears to be the intent and meaning of a truce; otherwise, it would be very difficult to define it.

VI. Governments are not bound to repair every loss that is occasioned by the calamities of war.

When the bishop of Munster, in 1665 and 1666, had taken and laid waste certain places in Over-Yssel, and the French, who had come to the assistance of our countrymen, had not behaved with much more moderation, the people of Over-Yssel applied to the states-general to be indemnified for the damage which they had suffered, but the counsellors having been consulted on that subject, gave it as their opinion, that no indemnity ought to be given, except for the deficiency suffered in their taxes and contributions, in proportion to the time during which the places had been occupied by the enemy.§ As to the remainder, it was to be imputed to fate, and was one of those calamities of war which must be supported by those on whom they happen to fall.

Afterwards, however, the same counsellors, having somewhat changed their opinion, thought that an indemnity ought to be allowed to the inhabitants of Over-Yssel for other things, and particularly for the money which they had been obliged to raise, to save their towns from threatened conflagration.|| Agreeably to this latter opinion, the states of Holland gave their vote on the 27th of February 1667.¶ I think that they were wrong, as far as concerned the monies levied on the inhabitants, to redeem the towns from conflagration; for, although it is certain, that that money actually saved them from being destroyed by fire; still it was not just, that the other confederates should bear the loss, who had not been exposed to the risk of perishing in that manner. For, nobody will venture to say, that a whole fleet ought to contribute, if a single ship is obliged to have recourse to jettison, for her own safety.

VII. Relates solely to the right of the several provinces of the Dutch confederation to make peace, as incident to that of making war. It is entirely local, and therefore is omitted in this translation.

VIII. One who resides in an enemy's country, under a safe conduct from the sovereign, may sue and be sued.

It has been questioned, whether, if a safe conduct is granted to an enemy to come into our country, he may be sued here by his creditors. It was so decreed by the court of Holland, in 1588, and their judgment was confirmed by the supreme court, on the 18th of September 1590. Those decrees, I think, were perfectly just; because, the safe conduct given to an enemy, is only to protect him against hostile acts; he becomes, by virtue of it, as it were, a neutral, and neutrals may be sued and detained for their debts. At the same time, if we permit enemies to be sued, we must not prevent them from prosecuting their demands against us in a course of law,* as I have discussed more at large in a former chapter.†

IX. A safe conduct to go into or pass through the enemy's country, is no protection out of the enemy's territory.

A safe conduct, in time of war, is given for no other purpose than that the party may safely come into the enemy's territory, and continue there. Wherefore, I am astonished, that lawyers should have doubted, whether he, who has a safe conduct to pass through the enemy's territory, may be taken in his own country by the law of war. This question was agitated in the case of the marquis of Messarano, who had received a safe conduct from the Spaniards to go from his own castle to Venice, passing through the Spanish Milanese territories; but before he sat out on his journey, the castle was taken by the Spaniards, and himself made prisoner. It was asked, whether he was exempted by his safe conduct from paying any ransom? Bellus, who himself sat as judge in the cause, did not venture to decide any thing, as he relates himself in his treatise De Re Militari;* neither does Zouch, agreeably to his custom, give any opinion on the point.† But Menochius‡ distinguishes, whether the marquis was then ready for his journey, or whether he was not; in the first case, he thinks that the safe conduct would; in the second, that it would not have availed him. The doubts of Bellus and Zouch appear to me as silly as the decision of Menochius. The marquis's castle and territory being invaded by the Spaniards, he was himself most lawfully a prisoner; because he had only asked for a protection in the enemy's territory, and not in his own, nor had he stipulated for a peace or a truce, but merely for a passage through the Milanese country into the territory of Venice. Whatever, therefore, was not within that particular object, was to be decided by the law of war.

X. It is unjust to compel a sovereign to make war or peace.

As it is unjust to force a prince to make war against his will, it is so likewise, to compel him to make peace. But, when the states-general, on the one hand, were afraid of the French, and the great men of England, on the other, were displeased with the extent of the territory of France, the kings of England and Sweden and the states-general, made a treaty on the 23d of January 1668, in which, among other things, they stipulated, that the Spaniards, who were then at war with the French, should be compelled to accept of certain conditions, prescribed by the said treaty; and that after they had accepted them, if the king of France should, nevertheless, continue to make war upon Spain, the allies should interfere in an hostile manner; and thus, the French and Spaniards were COMPELLED to make peace.

* P. 9. No. 15, & seq.

† De Jure Fec. p. 2. § 9. Q. 19.

‡ De arbitr. judic. quest. l. 2. cent. 4. cas. 336. n. 19, & seq.

In another instance, when it was not thought proper for the welfare of Europe, that the king of Sweden should also possess Denmark, the French, the English and the states-general, on the 21st of May 1659, forced the king of Sweden to make peace with the Danes,* and thus saved the king of Denmark from total ruin, to which he was exposed in consequence of having excited a neighbour more powerful than himself.

These are real injuries, cloaked with the pretence of a wish to make peace; a pretence which has been used to cover injuries of a much greater magnitude, which have been fashionable for some years past; for, princes, in their treaties with each other, have been in the habit of disposing of the dominions and territories of other sovereigns as if they were their own. Such injuries are the offspring of what is called the reason of state:

Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum.

If governments will yield to that monster, and indulge themselves in following its dictates, and considering the property of other nations as their own, it is idle and useless to investigate any more the law of nations, or discuss its principles.

INDEX

ACTIONS AND CREDITS OF AN ENEMY

- MAY be lawfully confiscated 51
But the advantage and security of commerce has induced in Europe, a general relaxation from this severity 57
Stipulation on this subject, between Great Britain and the United States 52
Actions and credits not confiscated, ipso jure, there must be a judgment of condemnation; otherwise they return to the first owner, after the war 57

ACTIONS AT CIVIL LAW.

- Actio negotiorum gestorum* 42
noxalis ibid.
exercitoria 150

AFRICA.

- The Algerines, Tunisians and Tripolitans, and other nations inhabiting the coast of Barbary in Africa, not to be considered as pirates 131
They have a regular government of their own, send and receive ambassadors, and make treaties 132
Make slaves of their prisoners ibid.
The Spaniards make slaves of them in like manner ibid.
The Dutch sell them to the Spaniards to be made slaves of, but do not keep them in slavery at home 21, 132

AITZEMA.

- Character of his book, Of Matters of State and War 25

ALGERINES.

See Africa.

ALIEN ENEMY.

- Residing in a country, under a license from the sovereign, may sue and be sued 195
In England, a plea of alien enemy must negative the fact, that the alien is residing under a safe conduct ibid.
See Enemies. Safe Conduct.

ALLIES.

- Considered as one state 71, 115
What is to be done by a state bound by conflicting alliances? 70
Remarkable instance of two nations at the same time in alliance and at war with each other 125 Territories belonging to an ally, and reconquered from the common enemy, to be restored ibid.

ANCIENT WRITERS ON MARI- TIME LAW

- Treated with disrespect by the author 44, 171
Vindication of their character 171

ARMS.

- By the Roman law, individuals were not allowed to manufacture arms, without a special permission from the government 93

Now arms may be sold at home to belligerents, by the subjects of a neutral state 178
 But must not be carried by neutrals to the belligerent's country ibid.
 Much less to a besieged town or blockaded port 82
 See Contraband. Blockade.

ARMY,

Wherever it may be, is considered in many respects, as a præsidium of the sovereign to whom it belongs 117
 May keep under confinement the prisoners which they have with them, on neutral territory ibid.
 See Præsidia. Prisoners.

BAYS

Are considered as a part of the adjacent territory 60
 Case of the ship Grange, captured in the bay of Delaware ibid.

BARBARY.

BESIEGED PLACES.

See Trade with blockaded and besieged Places.

BLOCKADE

Is, according to Grotius, the situation of ports shut or closely invested by an armed force 82
 The modern idea of universal blockade, not formerly entertained 84
 The Dutch, however, once boasted of having blockaded all the British dominions 31
 But there was no foundation for that boast ibid.
 The Spaniards also pretended to blockade all the Portuguese territories ibid.

And the English those of Spain 92
 But the right was always controverted and denied 31, 92
 See Trade with Blockaded and Besieged Places.

BOTTOMRY.

By the Roman law, the bottomry or respondentia creditor does not lose the benefit of his pledge by the confiscation of the ship or cargo 98
 Nor by the law of nations, when confiscation is merely ex re, and not ex delicto 81
 Nor when the ship or cargo are ransomed or given up by the captor 192
 See Confiscation. Jus Pignoris. Maritime Loan.

CAMPS

May be besieged as well as towns 85

CAPTAINS OF PRIVATEER SHIPS

Cannot enter into a partnership together, as to the captures which they may make, without the consent of their owners 141 Various decisions of the courts of Holland thereon ibid.
 Responsible in cases of unlawful capture or depredation at sea, to the whole extent of the injury suffered, not merely to the amount of the security given 148
 See Privateers. Owners of Privateers.

CAPTURES

Made by pirates, do not effect any change of property 127
 Made by vessels not commissioned, are considered in Great Britain and France, as Droits of admiralty 162
 Examination on general principles, of the respective claims of the owners, freighters, and master and mariners of the capturing vessel, to the benefit of such captures, when made in their own defence, or otherwise, in a justifiable manner 155

- Decision of the author thereon 156
 Arguments in support of it 158
 Decision of the supreme court of the United States in an analogous case of salvage ibid.
 Property captured, and afterwards ransomed or given up by the enemy, is not thereby liberated from the claims of the insurer or lender at maritime risk 192

- COMMISSION.
 Irregular in a subject to accept a commission from a foreign sovereign, without the permission of his own 130
- Made penal by the law of the United States 129 Different punishment, if commission is received within or without the limits of the United States ibid.

- CONTRABAND.
 Contraband articles are those which are proper for war, although they may be used out of war 77
 Such are arms, warlike stores, and materials of themselves fit to be used in war 78

- But not materials which are not of themselves fit for warlike use, but might easily be adapted to it 78
- Grotius's* distinction, as to articles which are contraband 75
- Provisions not contraband, unless when carried to a place besieged, or otherwise pressed by famine 69, 73
- Observation on the word otherwise ibid.
- It was formerly a capital crime at Rome to sell arms to the barbarians 74
- Now contraband goods are forfeited when taken in the act of carrying to the enemy 76
- Confiscation of the goods is in such cases the only penalty 74, 75
- The ship itself is not confiscated 95

- Retaliate on neutrals the injuries received from their enemies 61, 86
- Their conduct approved of by our author ibid.
- Contrary to his own principles 33, 86
- Forbid their enemy's armed vessels from approaching their shores, unless supported by a fleet, under the penalty of being treated as pirates 131
- Confiscate their vessels purchased by neutrals after condemnation in the enemy's country 29
- Capture and confiscate Spanish vessels covered by the English flag 111
- The English seize their vessels, by way of retaliation 112
- Refuse to admit certain districts and towns into their union after reconquering them from the enemy 125
- Complain to the king of England of the conduct of the Ostend privateers 137
- Refuse to restore to the Portuguese, their allies, countries reconquered from the common enemy 125
- Are in alliance, and at the same time at war with Portugal ibid.

VICE.

Unlawful to enlist into the service of an enemy	177
Prohibited by Dutch edicts	ibid.
Severe punishment inflicted by the Dutch on those who should enter into the naval service of the enemy	ibid.
But a subject or citizen may enter into the service of a friendly sove- reign, where no prohibition exists to the contrary	ibid.
American citizens prohibited by statute from enlisting (within the limits of the United States) into the land or naval service of any sovereign prince	179

Or abroad, to serve on board of foreign privateers 129
See Expatriation.

ENLISTING MEN ON FOREIGN TERRITORY.

Not lawful to entice away soldiers from the service of another prince 174
Nor to enlist private individuals on foreign territory, contrary to the prohibition of their own sovereign ibid.
But where no such prohibition exists, men not in the actual service of their prince may be enlisted 175
No difference in principle between enlisting men and purchasing war-like stores 178 Treaty on this subject between the Romans and Antiochus ibid.
Enlistments for foreign service prohibited in Holland 179
And in the United States, with the exception of transient foreigners, subjects of the prince into whose service they are enlisted ibid.

But was lawful there before ibid.
Was prohibited on account of the protestants ibid.
Is lawful by the constitution of Pennsylvania ibid.
And by the law of the United States, when bonâ fide, and under such circumstances as not to endanger the safety of the state 176 Provided it is not otherwise provided by the law of the state from which the citizen emigrates ibid.

An expatriated citizen is considered as an alien for commercial purposes 176

Quere, whether an American citizen can expatriate himself otherwise than in the manner which may be prescribed by our own laws; and whether his expatriation will be sufficient to rescue him from punishment for a crime committed against the United States? ibid.

FISHERY.

Herring fishery permitted on both sides, between the French and Dutch during war 25

FLEET,

Wherever it may be, is considered in many respects as a presidium of the nation to whom it belongs 117
See Præsidia.

FOREIGN LAWS.

Respect to be paid to 130
In the United States and Great Britain no regard is paid to the revenue laws of other countries 131
Various opinions on this subject ibid.

FOREIGN SENTENCES.

See Conclusiveness of the Sentences of Foreign Prize Courts.

FRAUD,

In matters of insurance, assimilated to piracy by the law of Holland 131

FREIGHT,

Not allowed to the master of a neutral vessel on contraband goods 81
Secus on enemy's goods ibid.
Reason of this difference 85

Not allowed to the captor of an enemy's vessel in right of the master, unless he has carried the goods to the place of their destination 105
 Or in certain cases, when brought to the claimant's own country ibid.
 Not merely allowed pro rata itineris, but as if the whole voyage had been performed 112

FRENCH,

Pursue a Spanish ship into Torbay, and invade the houses of the inhabitants to take the articles which the Spaniards had concealed there 65
 Refuse to restore to the Dutch, their allies, their property recaptured from the common enemy 119
 The Dutch retaliate 120
 Formerly condemned a neutral ship for having enemy's goods on board, and neutral goods for being on board of an enemy's ship 102

FORTIFICATIONS.

Not lawful to erect or repair fortifications during a truce, or pending a capitulation 193

GENEROSITY

Is a voluntary act, and cannot be required from an enemy 3
 Exemplified in the conduct of the Romans and English 4 See Justice.

GOODS AND CHATTELS

Of an enemy may be lawfully confiscated 17
 May be removed from the enemy's territory within a certain time after war commenced, when so stipulated by treaty 17
 Instances of similar treaties 13

 See War. Enemies.

GOVERNMENTS,

Responsible to foreign states for the unlawful conduct of their subjects in war 135
 Not bound to repair every loss that is occasioned by the calamities of war 194

HOLSTERS

Are contraband 79

IMMOVABLES SITUATE IN AN ENEMY'S COUNTRY

May by the strict law of war be confiscated 51
 But are now only sequestered, and the rents and profits received for the benefit of the state ibid.
 The lands themselves return to the owner at the peace ibid.
 An enemy cannot acquire lands in his enemy's country, even by will or inheritance 52 Lands so descending, confiscated in Holland ibid.

INSURANCE (Contract of)

 by Roccus ibid.
 The most frequent in commercial countries, after those of purchase, sale and hire 163
 Not known to the ancients, and why ibid.
 The object of this contract 164, 169

INSURANCE OF ENEMY'S PROPERTY, and of TRADE WITH ENEMIES,

Illegal on general principles 164
 Impolitic, as it furthers the operations of the enemy ibid.

- Prohibited from the earliest times, in almost every country in Europe 165
- Tolerated for a while by the English and Dutch ibid.
- By England, during the three wars which immediately preceded the French revolution ibid.
- Lord Hardwicke's and Lord Mansfield's decisions on the subject of similar insurances 166
- Dictated by political motives 167
- Overruled by later decisions ibid.
- The freedom of insurance ought to be coextensive with the freedom of trade 170
- No insurance is lawful which is made on a voyage prohibited by the laws of the country 172
- Even though it be made in general terms ibid.
- Property cannot be insured in England against capture by the cruizers of Great Britain, or her co-belligerents ibid.
- Reason given therefor by the English judges ibid.
- Better reason afforded by an American judge ibid.
- JOINT CAPTURE,
- On general principles, requires actual cooperation and assistance 144
- Particularly between privateers ibid.
- But between vessels of war, political considerations have induced in some countries the admission of constructive assistance 145
- French* and English law on this subject ibid.
- Law of Holland 143
- In cases of constructive assistance, the being in sight at the time of capture is the principal criterion 145
- But is not sufficient in England, in favour of privateers claiming to be joint captors with ships of war ibid.
- Otherwise in favour of ships of war, in competition with privateers ibid.
- No precise English decision on this point, in a case between privateers only 145
- Land forces* in England, not entitled to share in a capture without actual cooperation 146
- JURISDICTION.
- By the law of nations, pirates may be tried and punished wherever found 133
- But captures made by virtue of a commission from a sovereign can only be tried by the tribunals of the captor 134
- Reasons given by professor Rutherford in support of this doctrine 135
- Various schemes proposed for vesting this power in other tribunals ibid.
- Hubner* and Galiani ibid.
- The tribunals of neutral sovereigns will, however, restore the property of their own subjects or citizens, brought into their own ports 136
- And prizes made in violation of their neutrality ibid.
- The courts of the United States have done so in various instances ibid.
- Act of Congress as to captures made within the waters or jurisdiction of the United States ibid.
- JUS PIGNORIS,
- Not extinguished, according to the Roman law, by the confiscation of the property pledged 80
- (Otherwise by the law of nations 81
- Not so, however, when the property is confiscated merely ex re, and not ex delicto ibid.
- The maxim of the civil law is fiscus credit creditoribus 80
- With us the opposite maxim prevails, et creditores cedunt fisco ibid.
- See Freight. Confiscation.
- JUSTICE
- And generosity compared 5

LANDS.

See Immovables.

LAND FORCES

Not entitled to participate in the benefit of a capture, without actual co-operation and assistance 146
See Joint Captures.

LAWFUL GOODS

Not to be condemned on account of their being shipped on board the same vessel with contraband goods 94
Unless all the goods belong to the same owner ibid.

LAW OF NATIONS

Not to be deduced from European manners and customs 11, 17
To be deduced from reason and usage 76
Or an almost perpetual succession of treaties ibid.
Its principles may safely be sought for in the rules of Roman jurisprudence 107
In the discussion of general principles, we are bound to attend more to reason than to treaties 109
The rules of the law of nations cannot be dispensed with by individuals 169

LAWS,

To affect future, and not past transactions 170

LEGHORN,

Capture by the French of an English vessel near the port of 61

LETTERS OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL

Is the old technical name for a privateer's commission 183
Is often applied to designate a merchant vessel armed for defence ibid.
See Reprisals.

LIEN.

See Jus Pignoris. Freight. Confiscation.

MARITIME LOAN,

Or Loan at Maritime Risk.
What it is at the civil law 192
See Bottomry.

MILITARY RIGHTS,

Distinguished from civil rights 116

NEUTRALS,

Residing on the enemy's territory, to be considered as enemies 25
Not to interfere with the war, or what relates to the war 67
Have nothing to do with the justice or injustice of the war 68, 70, 71, 75
Unless threatened with danger 70
Grotius of a different opinion 67
Not to send arms or men to either party 68, 70
May trade with the belligerents in every kind of merchandize, except contraband, as they did before the war 76
May freely trade with either belligerent in innocent articles 104
A neutral violating his neutrality is considered by the belligerent as an individual enemy 172

NEUTRAL FORTS,

No act of hostility to be committed within reach of their cannon 63
But fresh pursuit may be continued ibid.
Provided the fortresses are spared, though they should assist the enemy ibid.
Cannot lawfully be occupied by a belligerent, for fear his enemy should do the same 190
Various opinions on this subject ibid.

NEUTRAL GOODS,

- On the territory of a belligerent, cannot be made prize 23
 Nor when taken on board of an enemy's ship 100
 Though the owner knew her to be a hostile vessel 104
 Are however presumed to belong to enemies, until the contrary is proved 101, 104
 And are considered as good prize by the modern law of nations 103
 Rule of the Consolato on this subject 104
 Old French law, that the goods of an enemy confiscate those of a friend 102
Grotius endeavours to explain it away ibid.
 But Valin rebukes him for it 103
 Modern law of nations confiscates neutral goods on board of an enemy's ship, but leaves enemy's goods on board of a neutral vessel free ibid.

NEUTRALITY

- Defined 66
 Divided into absolute and qualified 69
 Difficult to draw the line between a qualified neutrality and an alliance 69
 Our author seems to confound them together 75
 No adequate word in the Latin language to express neutrality 66
 Its general duties ibid.
 The Dutch once considered it lawful for their subjects to fight for either party 67
 Not approved ibid.

NEUTRAL PORT.

- Whether a prize may be lawfully condemned while lying in a 118
 See Prasidia.

NEUTRAL SHIPS.

- Law of Holland, that neutral ships coming from enemy's ports might be lawfully condemned 73

- Was special, and made for the occasion 78
 Explained 30, 87

NEUTRAL TERRITORY,

- No hostilities to be committed thereon 58, 64
 Nor in neutral ports 58
 Nor at sea within reach of cannon shot from the neutral shore 59
 But an attack already commenced may be pursued 62
 So that it be done without injury to the neutral 63
 Captures made within the neutral jurisdiction to be restored at the expense of the neutral sovereign ibid.
 Troops not permitted to pass through it, to commit depredations on a friend 64
 See Van Tromp. Bergen. Leghorn. Bays. Dominion of the Sea.

NON-COMMISSIONED PRIVATEERS.

- To whom their prizes are to belong when made in their own defence, or from some other justifiable cause 155
 Arguments of the author to prove that they ought only to belong to the actual captors ibid.
 In England and France, prizes taken by non-commissioned vessels are considered as droits of admiralty 162 See Captures. Salvage.

OCCUPATION

- Of a town or place gives a legal possession of its dependencies 45
 Provided no part thereof is occupied by the enemy 46
 For there is no jointenancy in war ibid.

But the occupation even of the metropolis of an empire, does not confer the possession of distant dependencies not yet subdued 49
 Historical examples in point ibid.

ORDERS

In war are strictly to be obeyed 193

OWNERS OF PRIVATEERS,

Responsible to the whole extent of the injury suffered, not merely the amount of the security given 149, 153
 Though the vessel is not regularly commissioned, if the owner ordered her to make captures 153
 See Privateers. Captains of Privateer Ships.

PERFIDY,

Reprobated in war 3
 Exemplified in the conduct of a Dutch captain 15

PIRACY,

Various definitions of 127, 161
 Difference between piracy by the law of nations and at the common law 128
Quere, whether piracy by the law of nations merely is punishable by the admiralty courts of the United States and Great Britain 128
Wooddeson's opinion thereon 129
 By the law of nations, the punishment of piracy is Death 138
 Nor can this punishment be mitigated 138
 Various offences made or assimilated to piracy by municipal law 128, 129, 130, 131 See Pirates.

PIRATES

Are considered as enemies to the human race 133

And therefore may be tried and punished by the tribunals of any country into which they may be brought 133

Those are pirates and robbers who, without the authorization of any sovereign, commit depredations by sea or land 127

Those who commit depredations under commissions from different sovereigns at war with each other are pirates 128, 129

Nevertheless, the English once proceeded against a regularly commissioned French privateer as a pirate 134

And in like manner against a Spanish privateer 136

Quere, as to those who sail under commissions from different sovereigns not at war with each other 130

Various opinions thereon ibid.

Does not take place, except as to those things which have not become the property of the enemy 39

Takes place when captured property is retaken before it is carried into a port of the enemy 38

Or of an ally in the war 37

Even though it has long remained in a neutral port 38

But quere, if it has been condemned while lying there ibid. 41

Opinion of Sir William Scott and decision of the supreme court of the United States on this question ibid.

After a legal condemnation every former claim must cease 39

Among the Romans, applied principally to persons, and why 116

Took place in the territory of an ally or neutral 113

Treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians 114
 Among the modern nations of Europe, it is held as a maxim, that there is no right of postliminy as to things on neutral territory 115
 Distinction on this subject between military and civil rights, and the manner in which they are respectively evidenced 116
 As to prisoners, the right of postliminy takes place even on neutral territory 117
Vattel's and Loccenius's opinions on the subject 117, 18
 Is applicable to a whole people as well as to individuals 122
 When part of a state, after being conquered by an enemy, is reconquered by the nation to which it belonged, it is entitled to all its former rights by the law of postliminy ibid.
 The Dutch, however, refused to allow that right in several instances ibid.

PRÆSIDIA,

What it means 27, 36
 The ports of an ally are præsidia 38, 41, 113
 Different opinion once entertained in Holland 38
 A fleet is considered as præsidia 29, 41
 So is an army in many respects 117
Neutral ports, whether to be considered as præsidia 38, 41
 Are so to all purposes of safety 113
 And a belligerent may condemn captured property while lying there 38
 Various opinions on this point ibid.

PRISONERS

Were formerly made slaves of 20
 Are at present exchanged, according to their grades 21

PRIVATEERS.

Fitting out privateers to commit hostilities against a state at peace with us, made penal by the law of the United States 129

Or serving on board such privateer 129
 Different punishment, if offence committed within or without the limits of the United States ibid.
 The subject of privateering belongs to the law of nations 139
 It is a long time since sovereigns have begun to make use of privateers as auxiliary to the public force 140
 They were called Cruisers, Capers, Freebooters ibid.
 They are not pirates, because they act under the sanction of public authority ibid.
 The being in sight at the time of capture, not sufficient to entitle a privateer to be considered as a joint captor 144
 Security given by privateers in Holland, Great Britain, France, Spain, and the United States 147
 As to Spain, turn to the Errata.
 See Commission. Joint Capture.

May be condemned in the belligerent's courts at home while lying in a neutral port 32
Sir William Scott's opinions thereon ibid.
 Decisions of the supreme court of the United States in point ibid.
 May by the law of nations be sold in a neutral port 117, 120
 But the right to sell must be equally granted to both parties; otherwise neutrality is no longer preserved 120
 Unless there is a special treaty with one of the parties ibid.
 Edict of the states-general on this subject 121
 The author's opinion thereon 137

PRIZE COURTS,

- How constituted at présent in Europe 189
 Their judgments not sufficient to release the sovereign from responsibility ibid.
 Exemplified in the result of the controversy between Great Britain and Prussia, respecting the Silesia loan ibid.
 And by recent treaties ibid.
 The sentences of foreign prize courts ought not to be conclusive evidence in favour of underwriters ibid.
 See Sentences of Foreign Prize Courts.

PROMISES,

- To be kept in war 3
 See Treaties.

PROPERTY

- In ships and merchandize, when changed by capture 27
 By the Roman law, only when carried intra fraxidia 27
 Modern doctrine of twenty-four hours' possession 27
 Not observed in Holland 28
 Contrary to reason ibid.
 The English press the Dutch to adopt it ibid.
 Once not held to be changed in Holland, in a ship coming out of a blockaded port after being purchased by a neutral, until he had carried it into his own, or some other free port 29
 Edict of Louis XIV. to the same effect 33
 Retorted by the Dutch 34
 Notification of the English to the Hanse Towns to the same effect 33
 A proportional rate of salvage adopted in Holland, in lieu thereof 39
 Same rule agreed upon by treaty with England 37, 40
 In immovables taken in war, is not acquired by possession alone, unless it be a firm possession 45
 See Occupation. Captures. Recapture.

REASON,

- The source of the law of nations 76
 Its authority of the greatest weight 10
 Is the soul of the law of nations 11
 The supreme law of nations 96
 Its dictates may safely be sought for in the rules of the Roman law 107

REASON OF STATE,

- What it is 197
 When listened to by sovereigns, there is an end to the law of nations ibid.

RECAPTURE,

- Salvage due on 41
 Such salvage estimated in England and Holland according to the time that the prize has been in possession of the enemy 39, 40
 This rule is not equitable, 42
 Nor is that of twenty-four hours' possession ibid.
 Rule of the Consolato thereon 44
 See Captures. Property.

RECIPROCITY.

- Whatever right one arrogates to himself by the law of war he must also allow to his enemy 56

REPRISALS

- Mean recaption or retaking 182
 Analogous in name and substance to the common law process of wishernam ibid.
 Unknown to the Romans, and why ibid.
 General reprisals are the first step at the commencement of a public war, and are considered as equivalent to a declaration of it ibid.
 Special reprisals defined 182, 184
 Often lead to war 187
 Not to be granted without full knowledge of the cause. 183

- Nor unless there has been an open denial of justice 184
- The sovereign whose subjects are complained of must be applied to in the first instance 185
- Various treaties on this subject ibid.
- Opinion of the English jurists 188
- Precautions taken in France to prevent letters of reprisal being granted without sufficient cause 183
- Punishment in case such have been obtained on false pretences 184
- The right of granting letters of reprisal belongs to the sovereign alone, and cannot be delegated 187
- Reprisals may be granted for a debt, as well as for an injury done by actual violence 184
- May be granted to a resident alien, as well as to a subject ibid.
- May be enforced on the delinquent's property in the country of the sovereign who granted them 188
- But it must be done by legal means, and not manu forti ibid.
- Unless there is danger in delay ibid.
- RETALIATION
- To be exercised only on enemies, and not through the injury of a friend 33
- Instances to the contrary, and observations thereon 61, 86
- ROMAN LAW
- Is denominated in Europe the common law 53, 183
- Is a safe guide to discover the true principles of the law of nations 107
- Forbade the manufacturing of arms without the permission of the sovereign 98
- Nor by that law could any one kill an enemy of the Roman people, who was not a regularly enlisted soldier 139
- The Romans, however, adopted the law of Solon, permitting private associations for the purpose of plunder, quere? ibid.
- Forbade navigation during the winter months 163
- On the subject of ex post facto laws 169
- See Actions at Civil Law. Contracts at the Civil Law.
- SADDLES
- Are contraband 79
- SAFE CONDUCT
- No protection out of the place for which it is granted 195
- One who resides in an enemy's country, under a safe conduct from the sovereign, may sue and be sued ibid.
- But cannot be sued where he is not allowed to sue 56
- See Alien Enemy.
- SALUTE,
- In close seas, or within the extent of the jurisdiction of the sovereign of the coast, to be given precisely in such manner as that sovereign requires 59
- SALVAGE
- Allowed by the supreme court of the United States to the owners and freighters of the Saloor ship 158
- Contrary doctrine maintained by the author, in the analogous case of captures made by non-commissioned privateers 155
- Allowed in cases of recapture, and how 39
- See Captures. Recaptures.
- SANTERNA.
- See Ancient writers on Maritime Law.
- SECURITIES OF PRIVATEERS
- Not responsible beyond the amount of their bonds or stipulations 149

SENTENCE OF CONDEMNATION

- Converts the military right to a prize into a civil right, and is the legal evidence thereof 116
- Is always in England, as to neutral property taken in war, on the ground of its having belonged to enemies, whatever may be the real specific cause or motive 173
- Palpable injustice of the British doctrine, which makes a foreign sentence conclusive evidence of non-neutrality in favour of underwriters 168
- This doctrine, however profitable it may be to belligerents, is ruinous to neutral nations, and particularly to America ibid.
- Is exploded in Pennsylvania and New York ibid.
- See Conclusiveness of the Sentences of Foreign Prize Courts.

- Not to be confiscated for contraband goods on board 94
- Unless shipped with the privity of the owner of the ship ibid.
- Various treaties on this subject
- Confiscated by the law of France, if contraband amount to three quarters of the cargo 99
- Rule in England, to release the ship without freight, unless the owner is particeps fraudis ibid.
- Confiscated by the civil law for having unlawful goods on board, when shipped with the privity of the master, otherwise not 106
- If vessel belongs to the master himself, this principle cannot apply, because he generally knows by the bills of lading what goods are shipped on board 107
- And it may be doubted, whether the owners are not bound for the fault of the master ibid.
- See Neutral Ships.

SPANIARDS

- Pretend to blockade all the Portuguese dominions 31
- Their claim opposed by the Dutch ibid.
- The English pretend in the same manner to blockade the Spanish dominions 92
- See Blockade. Dutch. English.

STRACCHA.

- See Ancient Writers on Maritime Law.

SWORD HILTS AND BELTS

- Are contraband 79

TOBACCO,

- Once pretended by the Spaniards to be contraband, and why 80

TRADE WITH BLOCKADED OR BESIEGED PLACES.

- Unlawful to carry any thing to such places, whether contraband or not 82
- Grotius's* opinion thereon ibid.
- Mere confiscation not a sufficient punishment for these who thus trade; a corporal penalty, at least, if not death, often inflicted 84
- But this severity applies only to a strict blockade ibid.
- And at this day no punishment is inflicted but confiscation 85
- The same in our American treaties 85
- Blockade of the French ports by the Dutch, and edict thereon 30, 86
- In goods not contraband, has sometimes been allowed 92
- Prohibition of trade with places not actually blockaded or besieged, too unjust to be defended 85
- See Blockade. English. Dutch. Spaniards.

TRADING WITH ENEMIES

- Forbidden by the law of war 23, 24
 By positive law in Holland ibid.
 By France, in a declaration of war against England 21
 Was formerly held lawful in Eng- land 165
 Is now prohibited there 167
 Sometimes permitted in part, by agreement between the belligerent nations 25
France and England in the present war trade with each other, and interdict that trade to neutrals ibid.
 Illegal on general principles 165
 Prohibited in Holland, even to foreigners 171
 See Insurance of Enemy's Property.

TREATIES

- Made with a view to war, are to be observed in war 3, 51
 Are from necessity to be interpreted by the interested parties 75
 Of defensive alliance, how to be construed 71
 Lord Hawkesbury's opinion thereon cited ibid.
 The party bound to assist is to judge of the casus fœderis 72
 One, or perhaps two treaties which vary from general usage, do not constitute the law of nations 76
